THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 50.

clerks authorized by the third section of the act of March 3, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," in the office of the Register of the Treasury, three clerks of class four, to include the clerk now authorized to take charge of the redemption of stocks; and in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, five clerks of class two, and fifteen clerks of class three; and such clerks shall be paid according to the provisions of said section, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. President, two of these clerks are proposed to be added to the Treasury Department as statistical clerks in the Register's office; and the Secretary of the Treasury says it is indispensable to have them, in order to answer the calls for statistics. The other clerk in this office, for whom we propose to provide, has been there under a special act, but was not brought under the classification made last year. This only brings him within the classification, and legalizes his employment. We propose to add twenty clerks to the Pension Office, so as to make the whole number sixty-nine instead of forty-nine, as at present. That estimate was made for the classification a year ago or more, and there were then in the Pension Office something like one hundred and forty clerks; but it was supposed that the business would diminish, and therefore only forty-nine clerks were estimated for. The Commissioner of Pensions does not think that he can get along with less than sixty-nine, and hence it is proposed to add twenty to the present forty-nine. That is the object of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance is to add the following section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the special mail agent of the Post Office Department in California shall be — thousand dollars per annum, such rate to take effect in virtue of this provision from July 1, 1853.

Mr. GWIN. I move to fill the blank in that amendment with "five," so as to make the salary $5,000, and I will state the circumstances under which the amendment is proposed by the Committee on Finance. When this officer was appointed, and his commission sent out to California, the compensation was $1,600 a year, and he would not accept it at that salary. The services of such an officer were indispensable; and this gentleman was one of the most competent men in the State, and had the confidence of all sections. The delegation in Congress from California stated to him that if he would accept the office and discharge its duties, they would exert themselves to have the compensation placed at the sum which I propose. That document is in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

In addition to that, there is a letter from the postmaster at San Francisco, stating that the services of this gentleman were indispensable, and that he would not accept the office unless he had this compensation guaranteed to him, at least so far as the delegation in Congress from that State could do so.

The Postmaster General has recommended, in his annual report, that this increased salary should be given, and he has estimated for it at $4,000. He has always agreed that the salary should be $5,000, but inasmuch as that of the postmaster at San Francisco is but $4,000, he thought to give the post office agent in California a larger salary would not be treating that postmaster well; but that officer himself has sent a letter here, since that estimate was made, urging that his salary should be placed at $5,000.

The motion to fill the blank with "five" was agreed to, and the amendment, as thus amended, was adopted.

Mr. PEARCE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to offer the following amendment:

For continuing the preparation and publication of the stereotyped catalogue of the library of Congress, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to move to amend the bill, by adding at the end of the appropriations for the Department of State, the following:

For payment to John Bozman Keer, in addition to his salary and allowances, a chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua, the amount of his expenses on the journey to San Salvador and Guatemala, and of his expenses at those capitals, under his commissions to the Governments of those Republics, together with a full outfit as chargé d'affaires to the "national representation" of Central America.

I will simply say, that I conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and I understood him to concur with me that the larger portion of this amount ought at least to be considered as a deficiency, because it might have been paid out of the fund for contingent intercourse with foreign nations. If gentlemen desire to hear the history of the case I will give it with pleasure, but the amendment has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I think there can be no objection to it; but if any gentleman desires an explanation I will give it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to offer the following amendment:

For continuing the works for bringing water into the city of Washington, $500,000.

Mr. President, in the first place, I desire to state that this appropriation is one regularly asked for by the War Department. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the committee, asking for this appropriation, and assigning some reasons why it should be made at this time. I will read it:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1854.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a communication from Captain M. C. Meigs, corps of engineers, in charge of the Potomac aqueduct, presenting important considerations in support of his request for an early appropriation for that work, and beg leave to ask for it the favorable action of the Committee for the District of Columbia at as early a day as practicable.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JEFF. DAVIS, Secretary of War.

HON. MOSES NORRIS,
Chairman Committee for the District of Columbia.

I have before me the original provision, making an appropriation for this purpose. It was made in these words:

"To be expended under the direction of the President of the United States for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington, upon such plans and from such places, as he may approve, $100,000: Provided, That if the plan adopted by the President of the United States should require water to be drawn from any source within the limits of Maryland the assent of the Legislature of that State should first be obtained."

I desire to state, that one of the engineer corps was detailed by the President, for the purpose of making the surveys and necessary examinations in reference to the proper point from which water should be brought; and I believe it was necessary that they should go into the State of Maryland for the purpose of getting a sufficient supply. Under the plan which has been adopted, water is to be brought from the Great Falls of the Potomac river. That plan has been submitted to and approved by the President, and the ground has been surveyed and a portion of the work has been commenced. The Department is now unable, for the want of money, to proceed at this season of the year, which is the most favorable for the prosecution of the work.

Under the law of 1852 there was a provision contained in an appropriation bill, in a clause as to the building of the east wing of the Patent Office, a clause which I understand has been interpreted by the Department to refer to all contracts. It is in these words: "And that all contracts shall hereafter be advertised at least sixty days before the letting." So that the engineer who, under the control of the Government, now has the management of this great improvement, is unable to advertise for contracts for the aqueduct, and the necessary works for bringing the water into the District; and if you delay the appropriation until the general appropriation bills are passed, the whole summer will probably pass away before he can give the required notice of sixty days, and get a contract under that notice for the purpose of having the work done. The Secretary of War deems it very important that the appropriation should be made at once, so as to enable the officer to advertise the contract, to get the work done, and to supply us at once with the water which was contemplated by the original provision. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to the amendment proposed.

Mr. PETTIT. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether it is supposed that the additional $500,000 will complete this work?

Mr. PRATT. It will not.

Mr. PETTIT. $100,000 were appropriated last year, and now $500,000 are asked for.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator has had the opportunity of having full knowledge on the subject; for the report of the engineer having charge of the work was placed upon our tables at the commencement of the session. The pipe in which the water is to be conveyed is to be nine feet in diameter. It has been changed by direction of the President from the original plan—seven feet; and the whole cost will be $2,300,000. There has already been appropriated $100,000. The work is, therefore, about to be commenced. If we are to prosecute the work, it is manifestly right that we should make the appropriation now, so that the whole summer may not be lost to the parties who are to carry on the work. Those Senators who believe that it ought not to be done by the Federal Government will vote against the amendment; but I hope that every Senator who believes that it is proper upon the part of this Government to bring this supply of water into the Federal city will vote for the amendment. If the appropriation is to be made, it is right that it should be made now.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I trust that will be the issue, and I want it raised distinctly. I am one of those who do not believe that it is any part or parcel of the duty of the Federal Government to bring water into this "city of magnificent distances." I think the original appropriations ought to have been fought more thoroughly, especially by western men, who have to contest week after week, and night after night, for an appropriation of $50,000, or half that, to remove the largest obstructions which are in the greatest rivers of the West, or for any little railroad bill which does not take a dollar out of Uncle Sam's Treasury, but by which he gets more than he would have got if that land had not been appropriated. I wish now to have a test vote; and I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment. The Senator from Maryland has presented the question fairly, as he presents all questions; and I wish to inquire of him now how many millions it will take to complete this magnificent water establishment?

Mr. PETTIT. Fifteen or twenty millions, I suppose.

Mr. PRATT. I have stated already.

Mr. PETTIT. That statement is as to the iron pipe, if I understand it.

Mr. PRATT. I say that the whole work, by the increase of the capacity of the pipe required under the President's direction, from seven to nine feet diameter, according to the present plan, which will give a plentiful supply of water to this city for ages to come, will cost $2,300,000.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. That is according to the estimates. We have had some experience as to custom-houses and various improvements of this sort heretofore, and I apprehend that, before the work is done it will cost probably double that amount. But this is mere conjecture on my part. The amount mentioned by the Senator, however, is very large. I trust that we shall not commit ourselves to the expenditure of such an immense sum of money for this work. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask whether there has not been a proposition to bring this water here in an abundant supply for a far less sum; and whether he has seen any proposition of the kind?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I have not.

Mr. PETTIT. It was suggested to me by a

Senator, that a proposition had been made to bring water into the city for a comparatively small sum.

Mr. PRATT. I will state that there were various projects. One was to bring water from Rock creek, which is the creek dividing Georgetown from Washington city. The engineers made an estimate of the amount of money which it would require to bring water from that source. Another plan was to have an immense reservoir at the Little Falls of the Potomac, and to have the water pumped from the Potomac into the reservoir, and pipes to carry it from there to supply the District, and the amount necessary to carry out that plan was estimated. But the plan adopted by the President was to bring the water from the Great Falls of the Potomac, in a pipe nine feet in diameter, which will give a supply not merely for the present generation, but for all generations to come—a plentiful supply for the Federal and National city.

I had hoped to get the vote of my friend from Iowa for this proposition. As he did me the honor to say of me, I will say of him, that he certainly states his propositions broadly, and he comes directly to the point. I have always found him liberal towards other sections of the Union, as he expects others to be liberal to him. He says, however, that the West have to fight for every mere pittance for which they ask, and yet here is an appropriation for a different section of the country of $2,300,000, and he thinks it ought to have been fought originally harder than it was, and that every Senator ought now to look it in the face, and vote against it. Sir, I do not think it comes well from that section of the country to say they do not receive their full share of the appropriations of this Government. They do not count the public lands which are appropriated for the improvement of their various States as anything. I do not object, as I stated the other day incidentally, to those appropriations; but in the name of all that is good, let us have the credit of magnanimity and generosity in agreeing with them that they shall appropriate this public treasure for their own individual purposes, only to be incidentally advantageous to us of the old States.

Let us have the credit of it, at any rate; and when here is a work in which they are equally interested with us, a work intended for the national city, for that city planned by the Father of his Country, intended to be the seat of Government of this great Republic, as I hope it will be for all future time, let us not look at such an appropriation as this, and say it is sectional in its character. What makes it sectional? Is it alone for the people living here? It is for your Federal city. It is for the capital of this great Republic. Do you call that sectional? It is for a magnificent work; such a one as is appropriate to the National Capital; such a one as the American people should feel proud to have in the capital of the country. Are we to let New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and the other cities of the States of this Union, who, by their own mere city resources, are enabled to make these improvements, surpass the Federal Government in any improvement of utility of this sort?

I hope we shall have the yeas and nays upon this question, and that it will be considered a test. If we intend to go on with this work, let every Senator who intends to do so vote for the amendment. I agree that those who are opposed to it should vote against the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I voted last spring against commencing this work; but it has been commenced, and therefore I do not think this a test question. We had a test question at that time. Are we to have a test question whenever it is proposed to make an appropriation to carry on this work? The matter was well considered last year, and I then opposed this work. I do not recollect how my friend from Iowa stood in regard to it.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I always voted against it.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I recollect very well that I voted against it, and made a speech against it myself, on the ground that the city authorities and the people of this city were abundantly able, like those of other cities, to supply themselves with water; but on that occasion I was overruled, as I was in regard to the large appropriations for the extension of the Capitol. I believe this Capitol, as it now stands, is large enough for all constitutional legislation, though for the purpose of a grand consolidated empire, I confess it is not large enough.

But, sir, in respect to the water works, the question was decided a year ago. The work has been commenced; it has been well commenced. This, being the seat of the Federal Government, should have such a work as has been commenced. I am, therefore, willing to vote for this appropriation; but I rise for the purpose of saying, that this was not a test question. The test question was when we commenced the work. Having commenced it, and approving the plan as I do, I shall vote for the appropriation.

Mr. BROWN. I shall vote for this appropriation. I was on the committee in the House of Representatives which made the first report in favor of this project. I was in favor of it then, have been so ever since, and am so now. In every view in which I have looked at the subject, I regard the work as one which is necessary for the Government itself. Why, sir, what amount of property have you in the District of Columbia? What are your records worth? And what is your defense against that destroying element which consumes so much of private and public property everywhere? Suppose a fire breaks out to-morrow in one of the Departments, shall you have the scenes which you had when the Treasury building was burnt down, and when the General Post Office was burnt, ay, sir, and when the library of your Capitol was burnt, and you had not the means of putting out the fire?

Mr. PETTIT. There was plenty of water.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator says, in his seat, that there was plenty of water. Sir, the little pool in front of the Capitol was exhausted, and everybody knows that that was one of the principle causes why the library was burnt. You have not water surrounding any one of your public buildings sufficient to put it out if it were on fire to-day. The preservation of the vast amount of property you have here in buildings, and the infinitely more important property in records, is worth twenty times the cost of this work.

Whenever you undertake to put up public buildings, or construct public works of any kind, I am for doing it in the most substantial manner possible, and in a manner which shall reflect credit upon the Government. If the thing is worth doing, it is worth doing well. You have already appropriated some, I do not know how many, thousands of dollars, in bridging the Potomac, and yet have no bridge there yet. It is this niggardly spirit of economy which wastes more money than it would require three times over to do the thing right at the beginning. If the plan of that great, far-seeing old statesman [Andrew Jackson] had been pursued in reference to the construction of a bridge across that river, you would now have a work there worthy of the nation, and one which would not be required to be reconstructed every two or three years. He wanted to put up a national bridge, one which would reflect credit on the country, but in that he was overruled, and I think very unwisely overruled.

If there is a good, substantial reason for introducing water into the city of Washington, there is a good and sufficient reason, growing out of that fact, to introduce it in the proper way, and to so construct the works that they will last not only during this generation, but during all generations. I know very well that when I served on the Committee of the House, they told us, as an inducement to undertake the thing, that it could be done for $600,000 or $700,000. I was not humbugged with any such story. I never dreamed that it could be done at a less cost than some millions; and I have not, therefore, been startled by the account given by the Senator from Maryland, that we were asked to appropriate some $2,000,000 or $3,000,000.

New York paid $15,000,000, I believe—I do not know but that the sum was larger than that—to introduce an abundant supply of water into that city. Suppose we pay one third of that sum for introducing an abundant supply of water in the city of the nation, and the only city over which you have the right to exercise exclusive legislative jurisdiction—what of it? If the city of New York could pay $15,000,000 for an abundant supply of water, shall it be said that it is extravagant for us to pay $3,000,000, if indeed that sum shall be required, to introduce an abundant supply here to protect your Capitol, to protect all your various Departments, to protect the house in which the President lives, to protect all your public records, when every man knows, and must admit, that all those things are insecure without the water? If you will show me that there is already an abundant supply here, at the disposal of the public for public purposes, I will abandon my position; but from a pretty close investigation of the matter originally, I came to the conclusion that you had no such supply; that your records had been burnt, and public buildings destroyed, and are liable to be burnt and destroyed again, for want of a sufficient supply of water. I therefore went for an appropriation originally; I have been for it ever since, and I am for it now.

Mr. BUTLER. I believe it is very desirable that we should have water for some of the objects indicated by the honorable Senator from Mississippi; but I do not think it devolves exclusively upon the Federal Treasury to provide the means for introducing it. If we expend this money—$3,000,000; for I dare say it will be $3,000,000 or $4,000,000—the result of it is, that the Federal Treasury is used for the purpose of improving and enhancing the value of the private property of gentlemen in the city of Washington, without a single dollar being contributed by them.

Mr. BROWN. The same might be said of a proposition to appropriate money to build the walls of the Capitol. All improvements have the effect mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I have two objections to the gentleman's proposition. In the first place, I do not regard this as the capital of a nation at all.

Mr. BROWN. What is it the capital of?

Mr. BUTLER. Of the Confederacy.

Mr. BROWN. Very well; take it that way.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not willing to take the Federal Treasury to improve the property of individuals without those individuals contributing something. But I go upon another ground. If this money is to be expended exclusively under the responsibility of Federal agents—I do not say national agents—it will be abused, as all other expenses have been. If you put it in some measure under the security of private individuals having some control over it, it will be properly expended. I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I shall vote against the amendment. I am in favor of the principle, and voted originally to commence this work, but I am opposed to putting half a million of dollars on this deficiency bill when it has already been loaded down. The Committee on Finance have withheld many important and useful measures, in order to put the bill in such a shape as to avoid opposition in the other House. I am willing to vote on the regular appropriation bill for carrying on this work, though it will cost a great deal more money than I supposed it would when I voted for it originally; but I shall certainly vote against it on the deficiency bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Brown, Douglas, Evans, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Hunter, James, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Shields, Stuart, and Sumner—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Butler, Clay, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Sidel, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Williams, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit the following amendment:

For payment of the claim of Thomas N. Johnson for his services as marshal at the port of Shanghai from the 9th of December, 1851, to the 15th of September, 1853, the sum of $1,736 91.

I submit the letter of the Secretary of State, which shows the ground on which the appropriation is proposed to be made.

Several SENATORS. There is no objection to it. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. I have an amendment which I wish to offer, to come in as a separate section. It is for the purpose—which the Senate will see, I think, upon its being read—of preventing what is likely to be a very undignified contest between the two Houses, as to which shall first order a document to be printed. It is the following:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the provision contained in that portion of the seventh section of the act of the 26th of August, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," which provides, that when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same is hereby repealed; and when different printers are elected each shall do the printing for the House electing him; and so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and Bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire simply to state, before the question is put on that amendment, what will be evident to every Senator on a moment's reflection, that it will increase the cost of our printing to precisely the amount of the composition for all the Senate work. It will be recollected by Senators that when the bill changing the contract system for printing, and substituting printers to be elected by the two Houses, was under consideration, the provision proposed to be repealed by the amendment was inserted to guard against the additional expense. The Senator who introduces the amendment says it is to obviate a difficulty arising from an indecent haste in either branch of Congress in ordering the printing of a document which may be first sent to it.

Mr. BADGER. I said to avoid a contest between the two Houses.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Senator said indecent contest as to which House should first order printing.

Mr. BADGER. I said undignified.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not aware that any such contest has arisen, and I have seen no necessity for such a contest. I suppose that in the end the present system will produce precisely about the same results as would follow if this amendment were adopted; that is, that of the composition each printer would get about his proportion in the ordinary case; while, by this amendment, there will be an additional expenditure for the composition of this branch of Congress. How much it would amount to I am not prepared to say. It would perhaps be $10,000 for this session, or at any rate, $10,000 for the Congress. If the Senate are disposed to incur that additional expense, and change the provision of the law, I have no objection; but I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Having been for several years on the Committee on Printing in the other House, and not understanding exactly how much expense this amendment will involve, and as there is no probability of getting through the bill to day, I move the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall go on and get the bill reported to the Senate, at least, to day.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I have an additional section to offer myself, which I know will not be gotten through with in less than two or three hours. I believe this is the first adjournment I ever moved in my life; but I know I am right now.

The motion was agreed to; and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a privileged question; and before I make any remarks, I desire to state that, in anything I may say, I do not intend to cast any reflections upon the Speaker, because I know the difficulty he has in hearing. When the motion was made on yesterday evening to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, I made three distinct objections to it, which can be testified to by twenty-five men present; but the Speaker did not hear me. The gentleman who has the bill in charge first taken up—the indigent insane bill—is confined to his room. I was opposed to taking the bill up because the friends of the measure were not present to advocate it. I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, is this in order?

Mr. COBB. I am not going to be out of order.

Several MEMBERS. State your point of order.

Mr. COBB. My point of order is, that I made three distinct objections to going to the business upon the Speaker's table; but the Speaker, I suppose, did not hear me. I think that the House might agree, by unanimous consent, that the bill to which I refer should go back, and resume its place upon the Speaker's table; and then, when we proceed legitimately to the business upon the table, it will come up first in order.

The SPEAKER. In justice to himself, the Chair begs leave to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] that he did not hear the objections made by him, and did not know what the bill was, as some one was conversing with him at the time—although it was read—until a motion was made for the previous question. He then learned, from the conversation upon the floor rather than from the reading of the title, what the bill was. The Chair certainly could not have been influenced by any improper motives.

Mr. COBB. The House, I think, ought to allow the bill to go back upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who made the motion in relation to this bill, is not in his seat, and I shall object to any disposition being made of it, if I have power to do so, until that gentleman shall be in his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] as raising a question of order, but as making a proposition to the House.

Mr. COBB. I hope the friends of the measure will consent that the bill shall resume its place on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Reports are now in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENN. I desire to report back Senate bill No. 92, being "a bill for the benefit of settlers and occupants of the town of Council Bluffs, in Iowa," and I ask to have it put upon its passage. I will merely state to the House, that it is but a simple proposition to allow the people of Council Bluffs to enter the lands on which their town is situated at $1 25 per acre.

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Iowa will be good enough to suspend his remarks until the bill is reported.

The title of the bill was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Act for the benefit of the citizens and occupants of the town of Council Bluffs, in Iowa.

The bill was then read in extenso.

Mr. HENN. I would state, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, that by the act of May 23, 1844—the general act on the subject—the town is authorized to enter a half section of the land on which it is located. The town of Council Bluffs is laid off and built in ravines. It is an old Mormon town, having been originally settled by that people. It is built in ravines extending a mile up, consequently the whole of the town does not come on any one half section; and it is therefore necessary to give its citizens and occupants the right to enter a whole section, in order that they may compromise the entire of the town within it. This bill—which has been passed by the Senate—merely gives to the inhabitants the benefit of entering, at the price of $1 25 per acre, a whole section instead of the half section which they were authorized to enter by the act of Congress of May 23, 1844. I presume there will be no objection here to the bill. It was unanimously agreed upon by the Committee on Public Lands in both Houses. I therefore ask, Mr. Speaker, for its passage at this time.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIGENT INSANE.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Public Lands, which I send to the Clerk's desk for the purpose of its being read.

The Clerk accordingly proceeded to read the report, which is adverse to the House bill referred to that committee, making a grant of public lands to the several States and Territories in the Union for the benefit of the indigent insane persons.

Before the Clerk had finished the reading of the report,

Mr. ORR said: I desire to inquire of my friend from Ohio what purpose he proposes to accomplish in having this report read?

Mr. DISNEY. The reading is two thirds through with, and I desire that the House should hear it.

Mr. ORR. It is rather unusual to have papers of this character read in open House. I think it would have been much better to have had it printed, and allow members to read it for themselves.

Mr. DISNEY. My object is to have the report printed, but inasmuch as it is upon a very important subject, I think it desirable that it should be read through. I will again state to the gentleman that the reading of the report is two thirds through, and I hope no objection will be made to its being finished.

Mr. ORR. I will say to my friend from Ohio, that if the reading is nearly completed, I will not now object; but if I had known at the outset the length of the document, I should have objected. I think it is much better to follow the usual course, and have these documents printed without reading.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to ask if the report is accompanied by a bill?

Mr. DISNEY. I hope gentlemen will not take up any more of the time of the committee by objections. The reading will be through in a minute or two, if they will allow it to go on.

Mr. HAVEN. I was not objecting to the reading of the report. I inquired if it was accompanied with a bill?

The SPEAKER. It does accompany a bill.

Mr. BENNETT. At this point I will say to the House that I have a minority report to make in favor of the bill. I have it in my hands, and if the majority report is read to the House, I shall ask that the minority report may also be read as soon as the reading of the other is completed.

Mr. DISNEY. I have no objection to the gentleman's report being read. I hope the reading will be proceeded with.

Mr. KERR. I desire to know if the objection of a single member can prevent the further reading of this report?

The SPEAKER. If objection be made to the reading of a document, the question must be put to the House whether leave shall be granted.

Mr. DISNEY. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not object.

Mr. KERR. I have never before objected to anything in this House; but it is impossible to hear the report as read from the Clerk's desk, even if any good purpose were to be accomplished by it. If the gentleman from Ohio has any object in having the House listen to this reading at this time, I will not object; but I really do not see what object can be accomplished by it. I object to the further reading.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from North Carolina desires to know the reason why this report should be read. I will give him a reason, and a reason which I think will be satisfactory to him and to the House. I happen to be one of the minority of the committee which has reported against this bill. I am myself in favor of the bill, and—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it in order to debate the bill at this stage of the proceedings?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from North Carolina desired to hear a reason why the reading of this report should be proceeded with, and I rose for the purpose of giving that reason.

Mr. KERR. I withdraw my objection.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the report.

Mr. DISNEY then claimed the floor.

Mr. BENNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to make a counter report to that which has just been read, and to have it read also. It is unfair, I think, to submit a long argument upon one side of a question and refuse to hear the other side.

Mr. DISNEY. I have no objection to the presentation of the minority report.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I ask the consent of the House to allow me to present a minority report, and to have it read.

Mr. ORR. I object.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask for a vote of the House on the question of the reading of the report. I say that it is unfair to allow a long report upon one side to be read, and then to refuse a hearing to the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects to the reception of the report. It cannot therefore be read.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the gentleman object to the report being received? Well, I suppose I have a right to make the report, the gentleman from Ohio having yielded me the floor for that purpose.

Mr. ORR. I have no objection to the report being received, but I object to its being read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BENNETT. The gentleman from Ohio has yielded me the floor; and I want the Chair to rule whether I have a right to make the report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] submit any motion?

Mr. DISNEY. I move that the report just submitted be laid upon the table and printed, and that the bill accompanying it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, that order will be made.

Mr. COBB. I object to the reference.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to include the minority report in his motion to print. I will waive the reading of it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the two reports will lie upon the table, and be printed. There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The question recurred on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the vote is taken, I think that the report from the majority of the committee is a very able and important one, and expresses some very wholesome truths, and that it would be very important to send a good many copies of it to the country. I therefore move that ten thousand extra copies of it be printed.

The motion was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BENNETT. I move for the printing of the same number of extra copies of the minority report.

This motion received the same reference as the foregoing one.

Mr. HAVEN. I would like to inquire if it is in order to move that a special committee be appointed, to whom this bill may be referred? I believe that, in the last Congress, a bill of this character took that direction. It certainly is a bill of great importance; in connection with which a very able report has been made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. It is due to the friends of the bill to have an opportunity of answering in a way, at least, which will be so far as—

Mr. HAMILTON. Is there not a motion pending that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. HAVEN. I move that it be referred to a special committee.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order except by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The motion pending is to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DEAN. Is that motion debatable?

Mr. HAVEN. Does the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole prevent a motion to refer to any other committee?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. HAVEN. Is there not a special committee upon this subject?

The SPEAKER. There is no such special committee. Before a vote can be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from New York to refer this bill to a special committee, the motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union must be first disposed of.

Mr. HAVEN. I so understand it. It occurred to me that it would be in order to move to refer the bill to a select committee, to be appointed by the Chair, consisting of nine members, which is the course that has been heretofore taken in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion indicated by the gentleman from New York, after the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has been disposed of.

Mr. DEAN. These motions are debatable, I believe.

The SPEAKER. They are debatable; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] has the floor.

Mr. DEAN. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill having been read through by the Clerk, Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire—

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) The previous question has been demanded, consequently no further debate is in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, what is the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. Oh, we do not want it to be referred to the Committee of the Whole; we want it passed.

The House was then divided on seconding the demand for the previous question, and fifty-nine members voted in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HENDRICKS and BOCKOCK were appointed such tellers.

The House was then divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 51. So there was a second.

The question then recurring upon ordering the main question to be put—

Mr. WARREN moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BENNETT. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Bockock, Boyce, Caruthers, Caskie, Chastain, Chrisman, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Disney, Dowdell, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Elliott, Ellison, Fuller, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kittredge, Latham, Macdonald, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Macy, Maxwell, Millson, Murray, Nichols, Olds, Orr, John Perkins, Powell, Reese, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Shannon, Shaw, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Vansant, Walsh, Warren, John Wentworth, and Daniel B. Wright—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Appleton, Belcher, Bennett, Bugg, Carpenter, Chandler, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Cullom, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dick, Dickinson, Dunbar, Edmunds, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Goodrich, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hill, Howe, Hunt, Ingersoll, Kerr, Knox, Kurtz, Lane, Lilly, Lindley, McCulloch, McDougall, Matteson, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Norton, Packer, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seymour, Simmons, Singleton, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Straub, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Wade, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—89.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PECKHAM. If this motion is defeated, will the next question be upon putting the bill upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. If the House refuses to refer the bill, as a matter of course the question will be upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. PECKHAM. Is this the Senate or House bill?

The SPEAKER. It is the House bill.

Mr. COBB. I call for the yeas and nays upon the pending motion.

Mr. LATHAM. Is it in order to move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered, it must be now put.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Bliss, Bockock, Boyce, Caruthers, Caskie, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchill, Clingman, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Disney, Dowdell, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Ellison, Faulkner, Fenton, Fuller, Grow, Hamilton, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kittredge, Latham, Lindley, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Macy, Maxwell, May, Smith Miller, Millson, Murray, Nichols, Olds, Orr, Packer, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Reese, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Shannon, Shaw, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, John J. Taylor, Vansant, Wade, Walsh, Warren, Wells, John Wentworth, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Appleton, Banks, Belcher, Bennett, Bugg, Carpenter, Chandler, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Cullom, Thomas Davis, Dick, Dickinson, Dunbar, Edmunds, Etheridge, Everhart, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Goodrich, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hill, Howe, Hunt, Ingersoll, Kerr, Knox, Kurtz, Lane, Lilly, McCulloch, John G. Miller, Norton, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seymour, Simmons, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Straub, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—72.

So the bill was referred.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the vote by which the bill last under consideration was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table.

The question was taken; and the latter motion agreed to.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I now ask for a vote upon my motion.

APPRENTICES FOR THE NAVY, ETC.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to give way to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, for the purpose of having it referred.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I will give way for that purpose, if no one objects.

There was no objection, and

Mr. FLORENCE, by unanimous consent, introduced "a bill to provide for apprentices in the United States naval service, revenue service, and marine;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

STEAM FRIGATES FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Before asking a vote on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I desire to submit another motion, which I suppose has preference; I move the usual resolution to close debate upon the steam frigate bill at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That is too early; I hope the gentleman will say in two hours after its consideration shall have been resumed to-morrow.

Mr. BOCKOCK. The speeches which are to be made upon the Nebraska question can just as well be made upon any other bill. I suppose there will be no more general debate upon the steam frigate bill.

Mr. COX. That is a very short time for the discussion upon a bill of this importance. I hope the House will not close debate upon it at that time.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest, in addition, that to-morrow is private bill day, and that will limit the time for debate still further.

Mr. BOCKOCK. To-morrow is Thursday, and therefore not private bill day. At the request of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] however, I will so far modify the resolution as to fix the time—two hours after the committee shall resume the consideration of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I am opposed to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and I hope the House will vote it down. It is allowing too little time for discussion.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I will say to the gentleman, that if I thought any gentleman desired to speak upon the subject of the bill, I should be disposed to give the largest opportunity; but the speeches all seem to be upon the subject of Kansas and Nebraska, and they can be delivered just as well upon another bill, which will come up as soon as this is disposed of.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that the resolution may be read as it now stands.

The Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. FLAGLER. I would ask the Speaker if it does not require the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The resolution is a privileged one.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I move to amend the resolution, by fixing the time at a week from to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been demanded, no amendment is in order.

The question was then put on seconding the call for the previous question; and, on a division, there were—ayes 40—

Mr. ROBBINS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and FLORENCE were appointed.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to make a single inquiry of the Chair. If the House should refuse to-morrow to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, what would be the effect of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. That difficulty occurred to the Chair, but he did not feel himself at liberty to suggest it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like the gentleman from Virginia to afford members an opportunity of voting to close the debate in Committee of the Whole to-morrow at two o'clock. That would be definite.

Mr. BOCOCK. Many gentlemen object to so early a closing of discussion on the bill. If it be desired, I shall modify the resolution as suggested.

Mr. HOUSTON. As the resolution now stands, we are all in suspense as to when the debate really terminates. Let the time be definitely fixed; at least, let the gentleman modify his resolution so that the House may have an opportunity to vote on the proposition to close the debate to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. BOCOCK. In compliance with the gentleman's suggestion, I will so modify my resolution.

The House was then divided on seconding the call for the previous question; and there were—ayes 66, noes 64. So there was a second.

The question then recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The question now being on the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to lay the resolution upon the table, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Appleton, Bugg, Carpenter, Chandler, Cook, Corwin, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dick, Dickinson, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmonds, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Goodrich, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Hill, Howe, Daniel T. Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Lyon, McCulloch, Macy, Matteson, John G. Miller, Murray, Nichols, Norton, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Pringle, Ready, David Ritchie, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Shannon, Simmons, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Wade, Walley, Walsh, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan, Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, and Yates—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barry, Bell, Boccock, Boyce, Caruthers, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eddy, Elliott, English, Etheridge, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Goode, Green, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Houston, Hunt, Ingersoll, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Lane, Latham, Lilly, Lindley, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maxwell, May, Mayall, Smith Miller, Milson, Morrison, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Packer, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Puryear, Reese, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, John J. Taylor, Thurston, Vansant, Walker, Warren, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—94.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution; and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BOCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. BOCOCK then moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HAMILTON in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business before the committee was the consideration of the special order, being House bill (No. 52) "to authorize the construction of six first-class steam frigates, and for other purposes;" upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BARKSDALE said he proposed to devote the brief period of time to which he was entitled under the rules of the House, to the investigation of the bill to organize the territorial governments of Kansas and Nebraska, and answer at least a few of the objections which had been urged against its passage; and it might be proper for him to remark, in the commencement of what he intended to say, that in this connection it was not his purpose to enter into a discussion of the abstract question of slavery. So far as the argument was concerned, it was not necessary that he should do so. Neither would he discuss the general provisions of the bill. They are similar to the details of all bills organizing territorial governments, which have from time to time been passed by Congress; and he took it that it will meet with but little, if any opposition, and certainly none on principle.

The first objection he had heard urged was, that it was premature; that it is an anomaly in legislation, and that the white population of those Territories was not sufficient to demand the passage of this bill. This objection, however honestly entertained or plausible, will not stand the test of facts and scrutiny; and however much we may have objected to and doubted the propriety of the policy generally of introducing this bill, it was now before the House, without any agency of theirs; and now that it is here, it was their solemn duty to examine it dispassionately, and discuss it frankly and fully, and act on it with an eye single to the best interests of the country. They who have the greatest facility for acquiring information, say that there are American citizens in those Territories; and one undoubted fact of this is, that they have elected a Delegate to Congress, who is now here, seeking, in the name of the people whom he represents, the protection of this Government.

He referred to other proofs in support of his remarks, and said no southern man, with the light shed on this subject within a few years past, and a knowledge of the exciting scenes of 1850, especially on the admission of California, can hesitate as to the propriety of promptly passing this bill.

He likewise replied to other objections, insisting that the bill made full and ample provision for the protection of the Indians in those Territories. As to the Missouri compromise, he did not view it as a compact between the North and the South to be preserved by the people forever. The South acquiesced in it, but never indorsed it. The North itself, however, had disregarded it in more instances than one, and had repeatedly rejected it when offered by the South.

Mr. B. spoke for one hour. A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. NORTON next addressed the committee on the same subject, and in opposition to the bill, declaring that the Nebraska-Kansas bill was singular in its history, origin, and phraseology, by reason of the many emendations it underwent after it was reported in the Senate. Mr. N. spoke an hour. A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. KEITT obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having taken the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being House bill "to authorize the construction of six first-class steam frigates, and for other purposes," and had come to no conclusion thereon.

COMMUNICATION FROM INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, containing information as to the amount of appropriations which have been made by the Government, from time to time, for the benefit of the Cherokee Indians east, and the Cherokee Indians west, of the Mississippi, from 1815 to January, 1834; and also stating under what law or treaty each appropriation was made.

On motion by Mr. McMULLIN, the communication was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. HAVEN, the House then adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GEOGRAPHICAL LIBRARY.

Mr. EVERETT. I am requested, sir, to present the memorial of the committee of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, recommending the establishment of a geographical department in the Library of Congress.

This is a very able memorial, and presents, in a very striking light, the importance of and the necessity for such an establishment. It is signed by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, [Prof. Bache;] by the Superintendent of the National Observatory, [Lieutenant Maury;] by the Chief Engineer, [Colonel Abert;] by Colonel Force, of this city, well known for his acquaintance with this subject; by General Totten; by Lieutenant Davis, who is the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac; by Professor Guyot, a very distinguished geographer; and by Mr. E. B. Hunt, an intelligent officer of the Engineers of our Army connected with the Coast Survey. I will not take up the time of the Senate by dilating upon the importance of the subject; but I move the reference of the memorial to the appropriate committee, which is the Committee on the Library.

It was so referred.

AID TO COLLEGES.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I am requested to present the memorial of the faculty of Cumberland University, situated at Lebanon, Tennessee. The memorialists represent that there are in the United States one hundred and nineteen chartered colleges and universities, at which there are, at this time, some twelve thousand young men in the course of education, receiving instruction. They represent that many of these institutions are struggling with great pecuniary embarrassments, and are thereby prevented from extending the benefits of instruction to a great number of the youth of the country who are ready and desirous to receive an education at these institutions. It is their opinion that no public interest is of greater importance than the diffusion of the means of education among our citizens in every part of the Union; and as the public domain is, as they understand, the common property of all the States, they pray that one township of land may be granted to each of those institutions. I move that, without reading, the memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I am also charged with the presentation of the memorial of Elder C. Collins and sixty-four others, delegates of the churches composing the Baptist Association for West Tennessee. These memorialists set forth that they are members of a large body of Christians in the United States. I believe they are, save one, the most numerous denomination in the United States, for, by the last census, they appear to be about three millions in number.

The memorialists represent that, in their opinion, the Government of the United States should open negotiations for the purpose of securing the enjoyment of the rights of conscience to our citizens in foreign nations in amity with this country; and they ask for an expression of the opinion of this body upon that subject. They represent that we keep up a large diplomatic establishment for the purpose of securing and extending the rights and interests of commerce; and that the rights of conscience are of not less consideration to a large proportion of the people of the United States. And as we concede to all denominations, to all religious sects, Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, and even Mohammedans, the full enjoyment of the rights of conscience in this country, it is a proper and rightful subject for negotiations with foreign nations. They think, on this ground, we may justly claim some reciprocity of privilege on our part, especially with those civilized nations which are in amity with the United States.

I am aware that the Executive branch of this Government has interested itself heretofore in this subject, and I believe that some treaties have been made securing the privileges of our citizens in this respect, both with the States where the Roman Catholic is the established religion, and with Protestant States; but perhaps a great deal more can be done. Since the great increase of the facilities of travel abroad, and the extension of our commerce, we know that a very general interest is awakened in regard to those of our citizens who are traveling in foreign countries. The religious people of the United States particularly are deeply concerned when they find, that in many countries of Europe their fellow-citizens are obstructed in the exercise of the right of religious worship, in accordance with their own conscientious convictions. Our citizens who are traveling abroad for information or for pleasure are becoming very numerous; and this subject, therefore, is one of great importance. I have heard from other sources, and indeed I have seen some cases myself, where even the rights of sepulture have been denied, under circumstances calculated to awaken a very deep interest in the religious communities of the United States.

I know, sir, that there would be great delicacy on the part of the Government in pressing this subject with many of the States of Europe, but it seems to me that the Government might well do so without committing itself to anything improper. I think that by opening negotiations with other Governments, and representing to them the extensive privileges in this respect which we concede in this country, we might obtain some reciprocity from those countries which are in amity with us, and with whom we have extensive commercial and social intercourse, at least there is ground for such an expectation. I think this might well enough be pressed without committing the Government to any offensive course or any stringent measures for that purpose. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

NEBRASKA TERRITORY BILL.

Mr. BADGER. I desire now to present the remonstrance to which I alluded a few days ago, of David White, senior, and forty-two others, citizens of North Carolina, against the passage of the Nebraska bill. Among the signatures which are appended to it, I find sixteen of the name of White. I presume they are all members of the respectable Religious Society of Friends in various parts of the State. I merely wish to mention that their opposition to the bill is grounded upon the supposition that the provision in the bill to which objection is made will be an act of injustice or some breach of national faith; and as I have every reason to believe, from the character of the remonstrants, as far as I know them, and from the fact that they are citizens of North Carolina, that they are reasonable and just men, I think it highly probable that by this time, after the discussion which has taken place, they have found that they were entirely mistaken, and that the bill is neither unjust nor in violation of the national faith, and have therefore withdrawn their opposition to it. I move that the remonstrance lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of owners of tug or towing steamboats employed in the revenue district of New York, praying that all such boats not carrying passengers may be exempt from the inspection required by the act of August 30, 1852; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STUART presented a memorial of citizens of Michigan residing in the country bordering on Lake Superior, praying the improvement of the harbors on that lake; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of A. C. Carter and others, praying for further protection against the infringement of patents; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, two petitions of citizens of New Jersey, remonstrating against any infringement of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition of citizens of Delaware, praying that the duty on galvanized iron, and galvanized tinned iron, may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Juan Manuel Luco, and José Leander Luco, praying permission to file their evidence of title to a certain tract of land in the State of California before the Board of Commissioners for settling claims to lands in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jean Baptiste Beaubien, of Illinois, praying indemnity for the loss of certain lands in the city of Chicago, in said State, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom were referred documents relating to the claim of Thomas Rhodes, for compensation for improving the mail road between Mobile and New Orleans, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred a bill to authorize the sale of Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes; and the petition of David B. Sears, praying the right of preemption to a certain tract of land, settled and improved by him, reported the bill back with an amendment, in the form of a substitute.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a petition of the representatives of Thomas E. Anderson, for extra services rendered by him as Consul at Tripoli, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief. The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, it was Ordered, That the memorial of L. E. L. A. Lawson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Davis be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

JOHN GUZMAN.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Guzman, of Louisiana; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SLIDELL. I ask the Senate to put that bill upon its passage now. I am sure that when the report, which is a very short one, is read, there will be no objection on the part of the Senate to its passage.

Mr. PETTIT. I am satisfied, after a thorough investigation of the subject, that the bill ought to pass. It will not occupy any length of time to act upon it now.

The bill was read a second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm to John Guzman a certain tract of land described in the bill, which confirmation is to recognize his claim to the school section embraced in it, if the school authorities accede to it, and will take other land in lieu of it. It is provided, also, that the confirmation of his title shall only operate as a relinquishment forever on the part of the United States, and shall not interfere with any other adverse rights which may exist to any part of the land claimed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment from the House of Representatives, to the joint resolution of the Senate, authorizing the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws, have directed me to report it back, and to recommend that the Senate concur in the amendment. I ask that it may be considered at this time.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to consider the amendment of the House.

It is to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert the following:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for preparing a general revenue law in accordance with the resolution of the Senate, passed in January 1852, and the necessary expenses; and that the Secretary of the Treasury report to Congress at its meeting, in December next, the items of such pay and expenditure.

Mr. HAMLIN. That proposes to strike out $10,000 and insert $5,000, which I suppose will pay the expenses of codifying up to this time, and perhaps something more. It would have been far wiser, in my judgment, to pass the Senate resolution as it went to the House. But the House has not done so; and I am instructed to report, as I have done, in favor of concurring; but, at the same time, I state, that when the civil and diplomatic bill comes to the Senate, from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury which I have, it will be necessary to make an additional appropriation.

The amendment was concurred in.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1854;" the pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. BADGER to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the provision contained in that portion of the seventh section of the act of August 26, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," which provides, that when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the printer of that House which first ordered the same, is hereby repealed; and when different printers are elected, each shall do the printing for the House electing him; and so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and Bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer shall be divided equally between the printers of the two Houses.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the amendment, by adding the following:

Provided, That from and after the 3d day of March, 1855, the said act, entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: And provided also, That no contract or engagement made by either of the Executive Departments, or the authority of either House of Congress, under and by virtue of the provisions of said act before the time of the repeal, shall be vacated or impaired, and no law or resolution repealed by said act shall, by the repeal thereof, be revived or enforced.

Mr. President, the object which I have in offering that amendment is to place the question of the public printing in such position that it may be fairly considered in both Houses of Congress, as to the ultimate system which is to be adopted. My own views of the proper system I have submitted in a bill, which was adversely reported upon by the Committee on Printing. That bill I still intend, during the session, to call up and ask the sense of the Senate upon it. I wish it to stand in a position in which it may have fair play; and I am perfectly aware, that while the existing law stands it will be very easy to overthrow the bill and prevent its being carried through, even though a majority of Congress be in its favor. But if you provide that after the 3d March, 1855, there shall be no law upon the subject, except what in the interim you may pass, then I think a fair consideration of the whole subject will be had and a proper bill will be passed, and whenever such a bill is passed after discussion, and on the deliberate convictions of Congress, I shall be willing to abide by it in every respect. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am opposed to the amendment. I am very well satisfied that there is a difficulty attending the two Houses, as the law in relation to the public printing now stands. The House of Representatives has, at this session, elected one printer, and the Senate another; and that raises a difficulty. But it seems to me that, without going into the merits of the amendment, it is altogether out of place. That amendment has no reference to the bill under consideration, which is a bill making appropriations to provide for deficiencies incurred in the operations of the Government. Here is an amendment that has no kindred position to that; and it seems to me that if the Senate understood the facts correctly the amendment would not be pressed to the bill.

Conceding, however, that a majority of the Senate are inclined to adopt some provision for the purpose of remedying the existing evil, it occurs to me, without a thorough investigation of the subject, that the expense involved in the adoption of the amendment would be sufficient to deter the Senate from annually entailing upon the Government the great amount which will be incurred by it. If I am not mistaken the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. HAMLIN] has in his possession statistics which, from his position, he has obtained, and which, I presume, at the proper time, he will lay before the body, to sustain the position which I take. The fact cannot be denied that there is a difficulty in disposing of the printing to be done for this body in connection with the House of Representatives, as the law now stands. That is a question which the committee has now before it; it has caused more or less embarrassment; but even in order to obviate a difficulty of that kind by entailing a heavy expense upon the Treasury of the country, it seems to me Senators should pause before they attempt to ingraft it upon this bill. If I am not incorrectly informed, the change proposed by the amendment will make a difference of between $10,000 and $15,000 a session. Connected as I am with the Committee on Printing, I am satisfied that there should be some modification of the law, but not in the mode contemplated by the amendment. I think a provision could be made which would not entail on the Treasury the very heavy expense which would be entailed by this amendment at each annual session of Congress.

Now, what is proposed here? Because there is a disagreement between the House of Representatives and the Senate in the selection of the gentlemen who are to execute their printing, it is proposed to obviate the difficulty by incurring this extraordinary expense. If I am not mistaken, by the most clear and conclusive calculation, as demonstrated by the gentleman who has in charge the public printing of the country, the increase of cost will be between $10,000 and $15,000. I do not wish to be understood as taking side with this or that printer. I am perfectly content, as the majority of the body has elected a gentleman to transact the public printing, that we shall put it in such a form that the work for this body shall go to him; and, far from opposing, I would invite an amendment in the way of some modification of the law as it now stands, which would rid it of the difficulty which is now encountered in the disposition of the work. The law under which the printers have been elected, if I am not mistaken, contemplates that the same printer shall do the work for both Houses of Congress. It goes upon that hypothesis—that the work shall be done by the same printer; but that happens now not to be the fact.

Mr. BAYARD. It provides that each House shall elect separately.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I know that it provides that each House shall elect a separate printer; but, if you scrutinize the law, I say you will see that it must have been the sense of Congress that the work should be done by the same printer. Look at the difficulty which has arisen, and I presume that is the reason for offering the amendment. The law provides, that all the printing of any work which is ordered to be done by either House of Congress shall be done by the printer of the House which first orders its printing. Now, look at the difficulty which has arisen from this provision in a special case. Some weeks ago the mechanical portion of the report of the Patent Office was sent to this body, and ordered to be printed. As a matter of course, it went to the printer of the Senate. After that, the agricultural portion of the report was sent in to, and ordered to be printed by, the House. The contest is now, who is entitled to the printing of that second portion? It is an adjourned question. It is an undetermined question now before the joint committee of the two Houses; and how are we to dispose of it? It is a legal question, to be determined by legal investigation, in order to see which, according to the law, is entitled to the printing of the first and second parts.

Now, if the honorable Senator who has offered the amendment will put it in such a form as to remove the difficulty, without incurring the heavy expense which is here contemplated, I assure him I am not disposed to thwart the action of this body in the selection of its printer, and I will vote for any amendment which will not entail on us the expense which his amendment will entail. As it is, we are meeting difficulties at every point. I am anxious to obviate these difficulties; but I am not anxious to obviate them at the heavy and extraordinary expense which will be entailed upon the country by the amendment. If the honorable Senator who has offered it, or any other Senator, will offer such an amendment as will carry our printing to the printer of this body, ridding it of the expense which the pending amendment will incur, and lead to no more expense than is already incurred under the present law, I am prepared to say that the Senate should be gratified in giving its printing to him who has been selected by the majority of the body. I have no feeling on the subject. I am not opposing the amendment simply to benefit this individual or that; but I want to obviate the difficulty and relieve the Committee on Printing from the responsibility which now attaches to it. At the same time, however, I do not like to incur the extraordinary expense, which will ensue, if the amendment be adopted.

It seems to me that the Senator who has offered the amendment could devise some plan by which the power could be delegated to the committee, or to the Superintendent of the Public Printing, to parcel out the work to the printers, and to require the press-work, and other materials to be used in common, without throwing upon the Government this heavy outlay of money. It seems to me that such an amendment could be offered without difficulty. In such a case the Superintendent of the Public Printing might determine, when the work was ordered by one House, and afterwards also by the other, that the same press-work and everything else should be used for it by the gentleman who prints for the body last making the order. It is not, therefore, for the purpose of showing any favoritism to this press or to that press, but it is for the avowed object of bringing this to the notice of the Senate, to admonish the body of the consequences that will ensue, if the amendment be adopted, that I have submitted these remarks. It was but the other day that I spoke to a distinguished gentleman on this floor, and told him that the law as it now stands, and as the printers are now selected, throws difficulties, in the execution of the law, before the committee—and difficulties which will be found to be serious. But is it not possible that we can now agree to place the printing upon such a footing as to avoid the increased expense, and at the same time award our printing to the gentleman who has been selected by this body? It is not with the view of preventing that that I am combating the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; but it is with the sole view of impressing upon the Senate the idea that I believe this can be done, while at the same time we can avoid an extraordinary expense. I have no feeling for this gentleman or for that gentleman, so far as the printing is concerned. I am willing at all times to yield to the majority who have at their pleasure selected a gentleman to discharge the work, and to award him what we order to be printed; but I do not want to do it under the heavy penalty imposed by the amendment.

Mr. WELLER. I regret very much to differ on this occasion from the Senator from Alabama. Ordinarily he is right; but if I understand the object proposed by this amendment, it is simply this: each branch of Congress is authorized, under the existing law, to elect a printer for its own printing. Under the law as it now stands, the Senate and the House of Representatives each elects a printer. This proposition is simply that the printer elected by the Senate shall have the control of the printing which may be ordered by the Senate; and that the printer who is selected by the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, have the control of the printing ordered by that body. If there be any defect in the law as it now exists, it is in this: that we are allowing other persons to have the control of an office which, under the existing law, we are authorized to fill. We may elect a public printer, who is ostensibly the printer of the Senate; and yet, under the law as it now stands, by the agency of some other body, or by trickery or management, that office may be rendered entirely valueless. It is to prevent that; it is to make the officer or the Senate independent of the action of the other branch of Congress, and to give him the control of that printing which we may choose to order, that this proposition is made. That is the principle incorporated in the amendment, and that is the whole of it.

So long as we elect a public printer, I should like to know upon what ground my friend from Alabama would concede to the other House of Congress, or to any of the Departments, or to the Superintendent of the Public Printing, the decision of the question as to the amount of printing which should be done by that officer? If it is found inexpedient to have the two officers, the two printers, one to each branch of Congress, let us abolish the law, let us change it; but so long as our public printer is intended to be independent of the other branch of Congress, let us retain to ourselves the exclusive right of directing what amount of printing shall be done by him. That is the whole object of the amendment. Why should it be otherwise? Why should we connect these two public printers any more than the duties of the other officers of the Senate and the House? Why not have a connection between the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two branches of Congress? If you intend that, in regard to the public printing, each branch of Congress shall be independent—if you claim the right for each branch of Congress to select its public printer—let the duties of the two printers be so separated that there never can be any conflict between the two branches of Congress as to who shall do the public printing. Everybody knows that there has been a contest as to which branch should first order the printing of any important public document, for the purpose of giving it a direction to the printer of either this or the other branch. The amendment, in my judgment, is simply a proposition to dissolve the connection—to make our printer independent of the other branch. Let each one take care of its own officers; let each branch of Congress be responsible for what printing it orders; and then the people will know where to attach the blame, if any blame there be.

Mr. BAYARD. As I never desire to embarrass the amendment of any other gentleman I will withdraw my amendment. I think, however, that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina only illustrates the evil of the whole law as it now stands. You have got one of two evils to encounter: You must either adopt the amendment, and increase, to some extent—I do not know to what extent—the expenditures of the public printing; or, on the other hand, if you do not pass the amendment, it will lead to an undignified scramble between the two Houses of Congress as to which shall dispense the greatest amount of patronage to the printer elected by it. I consider the whole system corrupt and corrupting. It makes the printer connected with the public press a stipendiary of Congress. It reacts upon, and injures the body; and it also tends to corrupt that which is a power for evil as well as for good—the press. It is my intention, independent of this amendment, which I withdraw for the present, to take the sense of the Senate on the propriety of continuing a system which has, in my belief, such deleterious results on the whole political morals of the country. I withdraw my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered on Mr. BAYARD'S amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I have no doubt that it will add something to the expense of the printing of the two Houses, but I have no idea that it will add anything like what the Senator from Alabama imagines. There can be at present no means of making an accurate estimate as to what the additional expense will be. Undoubtedly it will add something; but unless we do this, we shall have to engage in that scramble to which the Senator from California so well refers.

As the law stands whichever House first orders the printing of a document sends the whole printing of it to its own printer; the consequence is that it is in the power of the Departments to say to which printer the work shall go. It is in the power of the Departments to give the whole of the printing to that printer which they prefer, and the consequence may be that the printer of the other House may be broken down and lose by it. If we have the right, as the law gives it to us, to elect a public printer, it seems to me that we ought also to have the right of sending to him the printing which we order. That seems to me to be but justice. I believe it will avoid disputes if we do it; and unless we do it, there is danger that disputes will grow up. How is it in regard to the most profitable documents which have been printed? Here was the census report. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] moved to print that. I believe the first motion made to print it was made in this body; and the Committee on Printing, I also believe, reported against it. They afterwards fixed upon some other form, and reported a resolution to the House on the 12th of January, when it was agreed to by that body, while I think it was not reported here until the 16th of January. If I am wrong the Senator from Maine will correct me.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is certainly wrong. The Senator from Pennsylvania moved to print a very small volume, of about fifty pages, called the "Abstract of the Census," of which one hundred thousand copies were printed by the House last year. That was the proposition submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The question of printing that document was referred to the Committee on Printing, who reported against it. The same committee reported a joint resolution for printing another abstract of the census, which makes a volume of four hundred pages. That was an entirely different thing from the other.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the Senator if that report was not made in the House on the 12th of January, and if it was not made to the Senate only on the 16th, so that the Senate had no chance of giving the printing to its printer? I ask if the Joint Committee on Printing did not report this resolution for printing these copies to one branch on the 12th, and the other on the 16th? I have copies of the reports here; they are as follows:

"In the House of Representatives, January 12, 1854.
The House then resumed the consideration of the following Resolution, reported yesterday from the members of the Committee on Printing, on the part of the House, viz:
"Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, by the public printer of the House, fifty thousand copies of a Compendium of the Seventh Census, to be arranged by the Superintendent of the Census, embracing the population by towns and counties, the ratio tables of population; tables of nativities, births, marriages, and deaths; of the deaf, dumb, blind, insane, and idiotic; of schools and colleges; of aggregates of occupations; of churches; of newspapers and libraries, and of agricultural products; with illustrative notes and comparative tables: Provided, That the said compendium shall be printed in royal octavo form, and not exceed four hundred pages."

This resolution was amended, by inserting "one hundred thousand" instead of "fifty thousand," and it was agreed to January 12, 1854.

Then, in the Senate, it was

"Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate fifty thousand copies of a Compendium of the Seventh Census, to be arranged by the Superintendent of the Census; embracing the population, by towns and counties, the ratio tables of population; tables of nativities, births, marriages, and deaths; of the deaf, dumb, blind, insane, and idiotic; of schools and colleges; of aggregates of occupations; of churches; of newspapers and libraries; and of agricultural products; with illustrative notes and comparative tables: Provided, That the said compendium shall be printed in royal octavo form, and not exceed four hundred pages."

This was reported from the Committee on Printing by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and considered, and agreed to, January 16, 1854.

So then the Senate had no chance to give the printing to its printer. The report was not made to us until the 16th, and the order in the House was made on the 12th.

Now, in regard to the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, which is the most profitable document given to the public printer, I heard one day that it was carried to the other House, and that they were voting upon it. I went up to the desk of our Secretary, and asked if it had come here. It had not. Now, I ask, is it not obvious, in order to prevent these difficulties, if the Senate exercise the right to elect a public printer, that it ought to separate itself from the House, and have the means of sending its own printing to its own printer? Let each House have its printing done by its own printer. That is fair. If the privilege ought to be given to each House to elect its own printer that is certainly fair. I understand, and the Senator from California tells me that he is informed, on what he believes to be sufficient authority, that the increase in the cost of composition, by the proposed amendment, will be only $2,500 or $3,000. Had we not better give that in order to preserve the right, which the Senate has under the law, to elect its own printer? What is that right worth if all the work is taken from him, and the profits withdrawn from him? So far as I am concerned, I never have believed in the propriety of giving the public printing to editors. I have always voted to put it out to contract, or to put up a Government press, or so to dispose of the matter as to separate it, if possible, from the political press of the country. I will vote for any scheme which may be tolerably matured to effect that purpose; and whenever the Senator from Delaware shall bring it up he will find me aiding him with all my power to give it the force and effect of law. But until this is done, it seems to me we ought to do something to prevent a scramble between the two Houses in regard to the printing.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there is a good deal of misapprehension on the part of Senators in relation to this matter; first, as to the ordering of the printing; and, second, as to the expense. I was originally a member of the Committee on Printing, and a member of the select committee who reported the bill which changed the system of the printing of Congress. I was opposed to the passage of the printing law. I resisted it until I found myself almost alone. I believed that the contract system, fairly and rigidly enforced, would be the best and cheapest, and I constantly resisted any invasion upon it. I found myself powerless, and this law was passed. I had hoped that those who claimed that the system would be put upon a better footing after the passage of such a law as they desired, would not be, at least, the first to come here and complain of it. I hoped that that law might be permitted to remain until it had had a fair trial. I was opposed to it. I should oppose it now under such a state of things as then existed; but inasmuch as the law has been passed, I am for giving it a fair trial, and will stand by it until it has been fairly tested.

One very essential consideration urged by the friends of the bill, at that time, was, that it contained an express provision that double composition should not be paid, and would not be paid, if it passed. The Senator who now comes and asks us to change the law urged its passage then, upon the ground that it provided for one composition only.

Now, let me invite the attention of the Senate to this matter truly, as it exists, for a very few moments. So far as it is a matter of controversy between two individuals I have no feeling, and I care not one fig about it. The law provides for the election of a printer or printers. The House and the Senate, in the exercise of their rights, have seen fit to elect different persons as printers. The law made provision as to the manner in which the printing should be disposed of. The printer of the House and the printer of the Senate, then, were respectively elected under that law, with the full knowledge of precisely what were their rights, to wit: that each printer would print what was printed exclusively in either branch by itself, and that the printer of the House would print such documents for the Senate as were first ordered by the House, and that the printer of the Senate would print for the House such documents as were first ordered by the Senate. That was the law. So it stood when these persons were elected; so it stands now. The amendment proposes to change that, and to confer the exclusive printing of the Senate upon the Senate printer, notwithstanding the House may order the same document to be printed, and thus compel us to pay double composition for the same work.

I think my friend from California suggested that the printer was an officer of the Senate, and therefore he should be under our control. Now, sir, if that be the object you must go a step further, and remove your Superintendent of the Public Printing, for we have just nothing at all to do with him. We pass an order for printing. When we have passed the order we have nothing further to do with him. It passes from our hands to the Superintendent of the Public Printing; he gives it that direction which the law points out; and when the document is printed it is delivered to him. If the amendment should be adopted, we should have nothing to do only to order the printing; it would then go to the Superintendent, and instead of directing it according to the law as it now stands, he would direct that everything ordered to be printed by the Senate should go to the Senate printer, and everything ordered by the House should go to the House printer.

Now, in the first place, there is a very considerable amount of printing in the Senate, which is ordered and done by the Senate printer, with which the House have nothing to do, because they do not order copies of the same. That, therefore, belongs to the Senate printer, and that is not affected by this in any way. So it is with the House. It is only with those documents where the same are ordered in each House that difficulty arises; and in my humble judgment, notwithstanding the complaint of individuals, at the close of the session, the relative proportion of the two printers will be found to be just about in that proportion which the printing of the Senate bears to the printing of the House. If I am correct in the supposition, it would be just to continue our system, and there would be a saving of the expense incurred by double composition.

Now, let me allude to a suggestion made by my friend from Virginia, in relation to the printing of the census. It only goes to show how a man may be mistaken, and how information, when only partially imparted, may mislead the most honest mind. A few words in relation to this census document, about which so much complaint has been made. Whom made by? By men who, I apprehend, are interested in the matter. I find no fault with them for it, but still I think if there is annoyance, it is annoyance by the public printers of both branches, and it is not an annoyance of their own. We would not be annoyed in the transacting of our business, and the ordering of the printing, if we were approached by nobody, neither by the printer of the House or of the Senate. In relation to the printing of this census, I have only to say this: The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] offered a resolution one day to print an abstract of the census, which was denounced in the Senate last session for its inaccuracy. The Senate absolutely refused to print it. It was but a small document. It was referred to the Committee on Printing, who, on a reexamination of it, came to the conclusion unanimously that it was not worth while to reprint it; that it did not contain any information which was very valuable, and it was so small that it was no object to the printer, even if it had been accurate; but we believed it to be inaccurate, and reported against the printing; that is all there was about it.

In the House of Representatives a resolution was introduced and referred to the joint committee—for Senators will bear in mind that the Committee on Printing is a joint committee—asking the committee to inquire into the expediency of having an abstract of the present census printed. The committee gave the resolution a thorough investigation. They called before them the Superintendent of the Census, Mr. De Bow, and they compared with him the various tables of the large work which had been prepared, and, after spending several meetings upon it, they came unanimously to the conclusion to order an abstract to be printed, which should not contain over four hundred pages, and which should contain what, in their judgment, would be the most useful matter in that volume. And let me say, that when it is printed I think it will be vastly more useful than the larger edition, because it presents, in a condensed form, facts and figures which are useful. While in the large volume it would require an addition of different tables together. This, in my judgment, will render it very much more valuable than the large one. It will contain all that is really necessary or useful. The resolution requiring the printing of that document emanated from the House. The House committee considered it first, and made up their minds precisely as to what they would do. It was their matter, and after they had acted, the committee on the part of the Senate took the same work, and reported it, at their very next meeting, to the Senate. That is the whole history of that matter. That is the long and the short of it. It was, therefore, a proposition which originated in the House, and which was reported on first by the House committee, because it was their proposition. Then the Senate committee took their resolution, because, from the investigation of the committee, they came to the conclusion that that was the best compilation which could be made, and for the additional reason, that if we took that work, the cost of composition would be saved. I undertake to say that if the resolution ordering the printing of that work had emanated from the Senate, and if the committee had been directed by the Senate to investigate, and report upon the expediency or the propriety of having such a work prepared and printed, they would, in that case, have reported first to the Senate. I think the Senator from Virginia, if he had been a member of the Committee on Printing, would have done precisely what we did. As a matter of economy, I felt it, as one member of the committee, to be my duty to recommend the House proposition, after they had matured and reported upon it, instead of making a new document which should be substantially the same thing, with perhaps the difference of a page or two.

And let me say that that resolution now meets precisely what I understand to be the objection of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, which is, that the compendium does not include certain tables which he deems valuable. That resolution authorizes the inclusion of these very tables, if necessary; in other words, it authorizes the Superintendent to add notes which shall convey other facts that may be deemed essential. Any modifications which may be suggested by Senators will be considered by the committee, and, if thought necessary, will be put into the work, under the resolution as it now stands. The resolution was thus drawn for the purpose of accommodating as many as it was possible to accommodate; though, of course, it is impossible to accommodate every body. So much in relation to that work.

In relation to printing the Patent Office Report, I can only say that I know nothing about it. I was not in the Senate when either portion of that report was sent here. I came in when the mechanical portion was about being ordered to be printed. I think the Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] made the motion to print it, and I came in just as he was offering it, and I made a suggestion to him as to the manner in which he should present it. That is all that I know about that.

Now, sir, let us see what is the proportion of matter which has been printed by each printer. One thousand one hundred and ninety-two pages have been ordered to be printed by the Senate, which are to be executed for the Senate and the House. In other words, we have, at this session, ordered the printing of documents containing one thousand one hundred and ninety-two pages, which are printed for us, and are also printed by the Senate printer for the House. The House has ordered the printing of three thousand five hundred and forty-eight pages, which have been executed by the House printer for it and also for the Senate, being a proportion as about three to one of the pages thus far ordered to be printed. I find, by a statement which has been handed to me from the Superintendent of Public Printing, that the aggregates of the two branches, at the last session of Congress, bear about the proportion of two to one; or, in other words, the Senate printing cost $24,900, while the House printing cost $44,092; thus the proportionate cost of the printing ordered by each House is about two to one. The extra documents which have thus far been printed by the House printer for the Senate are about as three to one. I repeat again, however, that when the session shall have closed, I doubt not that the portion printed by the two respective printers will be relatively equal. I believe they will bear about the same relation to each other that the cost of the printing of one House does to that of the other. The cost of the House printing is twice as much as the Senate.

Mr. WELLER. Why does the Senator give the number of pages, and not the number of copies of the extra documents already printed?

Mr. HAMLIN. Because I am speaking now only of the cost of the composition. I hold in my hand a communication from the Superintendent of Public Printing, which I requested him to make last evening, on the adjournment of the Senate. It is quite complete, although it is not perfectly so. If it could be made perfect and accurate, so as to embrace the entire printing of Congress, it would swell the amount beyond what he has stated. It is based on that printing in regard to which he had the details before him, leaving out a little in regard to which he had not. I wish to have the communication read; but before it is read, I wish to state, first, that it shows that the composition of the last Congress would have amounted to $16,532, if the whole printing had been done under the present law. During a part of that Congress, the printing was done under contract, at a very low rate. This communication also shows that the cost of composition for this Congress, up to this date, amounts to $8,269. That is the cost of composition alone—one single item in the cost of the public printing, far below what will be the aggregate. The Superintendent tells us that the aggregate cost of composition will be at least $15,000 a Congress. How he comes to that conclusion I confess I do not understand; for he shows us by figures, that at this session, up to this time, it amounts to over $8,000. If we assume that the remainder of the printing for the Congress will cost the same, it would make the whole amount for composition over $16,000. He states the whole amount at $15,000; and probably, as we increase the printing as it goes along at every session of Congress, it will come up probably nearer to $20,000 than $15,000.

Mr. HUNTER. That is $15,000 for both Houses.

Mr. HAMLIN. Precisely; and it is just one composition in both Houses. Now, if you repeal that portion of the law, you double this sum.

Mr. HUNTER. Does not the Senator perceive that two thirds of that are for the House, and we only double the composition on one third for the Senate?

Mr. HAMLIN. I repeat, the sum will be just double that which is here stated; because this includes only the documents which are already ordered to be printed, and the same documents which are printed in both Houses. I will illustrate this. I will take the Patent Office Report, and I will assume that it is first ordered to be printed in the House; then the House printer is to be paid for the composition. The work comes here, and we order it to be printed, but the printing is executed by the House printer, and we have not to pay for its composition, as the law stands. Now, what is the cost of the composition? It is a given sum. The Superintendent states that the mechanical portion of the Patent Office Report will be four hundred pages, and the cost of the composition will be $500, and the cost of the agricultural part will be $700. Suppose one portion of it is first ordered to be printed in the Senate, and then it goes to the House. The Senate printer does the work under the present law, and but one composition is to be paid for. Now, if both were ordered to be printed in the House, and composition paid for to the House printer in addition, it is as evident as that two and two make four, that you just double the price of composition on those documents which are ordered to be printed in both Houses.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to ask the Senator a question, for information. I understand him to say that the statement to which he refers, made by the Superintendent of Printing, which was complete in its character, though not perfect, shows that $15,000 will be the amount of the cost of composition for documents printed by both Houses. I understand that is the result arrived at. Then the Senator immediately controverts his statement, by saying that he cannot see how the Superintendent arrived at that conclusion.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Superintendent first shows that the cost of composition for the work printed for the last Congress would, if paid for at the present rates, be $16,532. He shows that up to the present date the composition of the documents which have been ordered to be printed in both Houses at this session amounts to $8,269. Then he closes with a paragraph, which I will read:

"By the repeal of the seventh section of the printing act of 1852, or so much thereof as it is proposed to repeal, the additional cost of the printing for Congress may be fairly estimated at $15,000 for each Congress," &c.

What I say is this: The Superintendent, in his caution not to overestimate, has under estimated. I say it, because he shows, in fact, that the cost of composition at this session up to this time has been over $8,000 on works ordered to be printed by both Houses. I doubt not it will be more than $3,000, and probably $5,000 more at this session.

Mr. BAYARD. I will ask the Senator whether most of these documents, of which the greatest number are printed, such as the census report, and the reports accompanying the President's message, have not already been printed?

Mr. HAMLIN. Undoubtedly; most of the documents of which we shall have the same number in each branch of Congress have been printed. I have no doubt about that; but still, up to this time, the cost of composition has been over $8,000. I have no doubt, and that is all I need say, that the Superintendent, in his over caution, has understated rather than overstated the amount which it will cost. I now ask that the communication from the Superintendent may be read, for he states very clearly the whole matter.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING,
WASHINGTON, March 30, 1854.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry yesterday, as to the cost of composition of those public documents ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, I have the honor to submit the following statement:

At the first session of the Thirty-second Congress those documents that were printed by both Houses of Congress made 4,480 pages, at a cost for composition of... $6,085 00.
At the second session (including the Census, which made 1,158 large quarto pages) they made 5,010 pages, at a cost for composition of..... 10,447 00

It will be seen, therefore, that if the present printing law had been in operation during the whole of the Thirty-second Congress, without the seventh section, and there had been a different printer for each House, the cost of the printing would have been increased $16,532. It may be proper to state, however, that the data in this office is not sufficient to furnish a full statement as to the first session of the last Congress; the quantity of matter of the character referred to doubtless exceeded that above stated; but there are no means of ascertaining the exact amount, only a portion of the printing of that session having been executed under the superintendence of this office.

The cost of composition of the same documents, ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, during the present session, to this date, reaches nearly $10,000. Of course, in the absence of the provision of the printing law referred to, the cost of the composition would have been double this amount.

The principal documents ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, consist of the annual communications required by law from the President of the United States and the several heads of Departments.

The following is a list of the principal documents ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, at the present session, to this date, with their real or estimated cost for composition alone:

	No. of Pages.	Cost for Comp'n.
Message of the President of the United States, and accompanying documents.....	1,936	$2,466 00
Letter from Second Auditor, relative to Indian disbursements.....	552	1,001 00
Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances.....	384	502 00
Report of the Secretary of the Treasury Coast Survey, (quarto).....	500	1,500 00
Patent Office Report—Mechanical.....	400	500 00
“ “ Agricultural.....	600	700 00
Compendium of the Seventh Census, (non-parallel).....	400	1,500 00
		$8,269 00

Besides the reports of several surveying and exploring expeditions, and a considerable number of smaller documents.

By the repeal of the seventh section of the printing act of 1852, or so much thereof as it is proposed to repeal, the additional cost of the printing for Congress may be fairly estimated at $15,000 for each Congress, which will be paid for extra composition alone, provided that the Senate and House employ different printers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. SEAMAN, Superintendent.
Hon. H. HAMLIN, United States Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have but a few words more to say; but I desire to invite the attention of the Senator who offers the amendment to the suggestion which I make, and it is one of a practical character. It is this: The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina provides, first, for a repeal of the seventh section of the act of 1852, which requires that a document shall be printed by the House printer for the Senate, when the printing is first ordered by the House, and vice versa.

Then it provides that "each shall do the printing for the House electing him; and so much of the printing for the Executive Departments and Bureaus of the Government as is ordered by the said act to be done by the public printer, shall be equally divided between the printers of the two Houses."

The difficulty which this provision involves I will now point out to the Senator. The House has already ordered certain documents to be printed, which are now in the process of printing; some perhaps are in process of composition, and others are in press. The Senate has also ordered certain documents, and they are in process of printing, but in different stages. Now, suppose this amendment shall be adopted, in what manner is the printing already ordered to be completed?

Mr. BADGER. According to the law in force when it was ordered, of course.

Mr. HAMLIN. That law will be repealed by the passage of this provision; and there will then be no such law in existence. The House printer can, therefore, come forward and insist on his right, under this section, to do all the printing ordered by the House; and the Senate printer can make the same demand with regard to the Senate printing. I insist that the law under which they now act being repealed, they would have a right to do so. This would require double composition for all the work which is even in process of being printed. It seems so to me. There ought at least to be a provision to meet that exigency, if an amendment similar to this is to be adopted. I have nothing further to say in regard to this matter at present.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to speak to one part of the subject only; and to make myself distinctly understood upon it. I have a right to speak with some degree of intelligence, at least upon the matters connected with the census. I was one of the committee which had that matter in charge originally, of which an honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] was chairman, and of which Mr. Underwood was another member. It cost us a great deal of labor, and the tables were very carefully prepared. I was in the minority upon the committee, dissenting so far as regarded many of the columns, and dissenting essentially so far as regarded the propriety of publishing anything but the enumeration of the inhabitants, and perhaps the real estate of the country. But they went on in opposition to my views; and what was the result? Why, sir, a book of twelve hundred pages was presented to Congress. A book of twelve hundred pages, containing the results of that census, was authorized to be published under the authority of Congress. How stands that book? It differs from every one of the documents which are laid before us. The President's message cannot be changed by the House of Representatives, nor by the Senate. The reports of the heads of Departments cannot be changed either by the Senate or the House of Representatives; but how is it with regard to this book, which is known as the census of the United States? Why, sir, the House of Representatives have not only assumed to change the original character of the book, and make a compendium of it, but they have sent to the Senate a compendium, of which they are to be the author, and we the editor. We are to edit the book of which they are the author, and are to take it without examination, upon the recommendation of the House.

Now, sir, if this census is to go out—and if it is to go out as a book which may be arranged, edited, or compiled under the authority of the Senate or the House of Representatives—I take the liberty of saying that I wish the pen of the Senate at least to be allowed to write a single page in that history. But, how stands it? Here comes a book from the House of Representatives, to be published under the direction of the Census Bureau, with certain smooth columns, which will be very easily printed, and will be very profitable to the printer. What are they? One of them is a very curious piece of information to be sent out to the public, of how many paupers, how many lunatics, and how many idiots there are in the United States; when, to my utter surprise, in looking at it, and referring to my section of the country particularly, that which I supposed every man wishing valuable information to be published and sent out to the community would desire to have in it, is left out. There is no column showing how many acres of land are under the proprietorship of individuals in the United States. That which I wish to attain, (and I would not increase the columns by it,) is to substitute a statement showing how many acres of land are in cultivation in the different States. I would put that in place of the column of lunatics, and paupers, and idiots. Will any man say, in writing such a book, this would not be a more valuable piece of statistics than to state how many lunatics are in the United States? That may be information for the curious, but it can be ascertained from other sources. I know it is much easier to prepare that kind of a book than the one which I would wish; and it has been sent here by the House of Representatives, who undertake to be an intelligent author, sanctioned, I have no doubt, by a very intelligent critic—the Senator from Maine.

I am not going to say that he would not be a very good reviewer, but allow me to say that I do not think it is a good book. If we are going to reduce it from twelve hundred to four hundred pages—and I think it could be better reduced to two hundred—I am not disposed to mar it by striking out columns; but in filling it up I would strike out the column of lunatics, idiots, and insane, and insert a column showing the number of acres of land in cultivation in each of the different States. That could be very easily done. That information might be readily obtained; and it would be somewhat germane to the taking of the census, because Congress may possibly have occasion to impose something like a direct tax. What information have you now with regard to property which is taxable? None at all. In place of that information, you have a detailed statement as to lunatics and idiots. That is put in because it will make a smoother column, and an easier book for the printer. Then, I say, if we are to have a printer for the Senate, I want that printer to be under the authority of the Senate as an author, and not as an editor adopting the authorship of other people's books. As to the two or three thousand dollars difference which this will make as to the expense I regard it as nothing.

As I said before, we cannot change the standing documents; but this census compendium to which I have alluded could, if put under the care of an intelligent committee, be reduced from four hundred to two hundred pages with advantage. I am willing, however, to leave it a book of four hundred pages; but I would strike out many columns which are in it. It contains many items which the curious may readily obtain from other sources. I believe it contains a column showing the number of newspapers in the United States. What do I care about the number of newspapers? I believe the number of paupers is another item. Is it not so?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not able to say.

Mr. BUTLER. I think you have in it paupers, lunatics, idiots, and newspapers—very valuable information! Why, sir, the newspapers increase so fast that you cannot keep up with them. You will have to take a census every year in order to keep up with the newspaper race. I do not wish to see all that is valuable in such a work stricken out, with a view to have a smooth, easy book for the printer, and then have the House come here and say to us, that if we do not take it just as they arranged it, we are putting the country to expense. When I saw that I said, in good faith, that I would move a reconsideration of the resolution ordering that printing. I am glad that the question has come up in this form. I do not know that I understand exactly the provision of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; I ask, therefore, that it be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not refer to the census volume, but it separates the printing of the two Houses; that is what I want.

Mr. BADGER. I wish at this point to suggest a verbal amendment to my amendment, in the phrase "when different printers are elected." Let it read, "when there are different printers." It is perfectly immaterial, so far as this is concerned, whether they are elected or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) That change will be made, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I do not think that the subject of printing a compendium of the census is now legitimately before the Senate, but still, inasmuch as the Senator from South Carolina has alluded to it, I beg leave to say a word in reply, in order that the reply may go out with what he has said.

He first announced that that was a book from the House sent to us. In that the Senator is mistaken. The House passed a resolution directing the Joint Committee on Printing to prepare, or to have prepared, a compendium of the work to be printed. That resolution went to the joint committee, and was considered by them. The joint committee was composed of Senators and Representatives. It may be that the Senators upon that committee were unfortunate in the conclusions at which they arrived. I assure the honorable Senator from South Carolina that none of them claimed to be critics; far from it. But, in order to be accurate in the matter, we did—what? We called in a gentleman who had the subject in charge, and who, I think, has some reputation as a commercial statistician at the South, for the purpose of conferring with him as to what would constitute the best compendium which could be made. We did call in that man, and he came. We wished to consult him because of his long experience in commercial matters, and from his connection with this work. It may be that the committee went too far in listening to this gentleman, who is from the section of the country where my friend from South Carolina himself resides. It may be that the committee were too lenient in believing that he was too well qualified for the duties of his office. I think not, however. But it may be that there are some tables in the book which might have been better excluded and others included. I think, however, that if the Senator from South Carolina himself had had the charge of the subject committed to him solely, he would have found it utterly impossible to compile any work which would suit precisely every Senator. If we failed in satisfying every Senator in every particular, I do not know that it is to be a matter of surprise. I can only say that we gave to the subject the best examination we were capable of giving it, and acted very much under the direction of Mr. De Bow, who I then thought, and who I now think, is a man very well fitted for that business, and very capable. I do not know of a man whom I would select as his superior in this city at this time; consequently, if I were again to be charged with that duty, and were to consult with any individual, I think I should consult with him.

Mr. BUTLER. I think what I have said in reference to this book is a sufficient reason to reconcile me to separate the two printers, so that I, as a member of the Senate, may have some control over it. The Senator from Maine has referred to Mr. De Bow. He is a constituent of mine, and I know him very well by reputation and personally. I am not in the habit of indulging in laudation or censure as to any one, whether a constituent or not; but I have no doubt he is entirely, in fact I think eminently, qualified for this business; and I would be very willing to select him for such a work. When I was upon the Census Committee, however, originally, I differed from him, if this be his selection; and I differed from others; and I prefer other columns to those which he has included. I do not know that I would have implicitly adopted Mr. De Bow's tables.

Mr. HAMLIN. We did not.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that the committee did. There is no person that I would take sooner than Mr. De Bow to make out a work of this kind; but that has nothing to do with my approving tables which I do not wish to see there.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, as to the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] that this amendment does not sufficiently provide how the public printing which has already been ordered by the two Houses of Congress shall be executed, I would reply, that if there be anything valid in the objection, it can easily be remedied by an amendment, which he can himself offer. The only argument which I have heard against this amendment is the increase of expense which will be occasioned by it. I do not know what that expense may amount to. If it should amount to quite as much as the Senator has estimated it to be, it will form with me no sufficient objection to supporting the amendment. I think that amendment is rendered necessary by the practical working of the present system; for, whether the distribution of the public printing ordered by the two Houses has been so arranged by the greater activity of the friends of one of the printers, or whether it has resulted from accident, the fact is nevertheless indisputable, that about ten times as much in value of the printing for Congress has gone to the printer of the House of Representatives as has fallen to the Senate printer.

Now, I think we owe it to our printer, whom we have elected, and who is our officer, to see that he shall have as much, at least, of the printing for the Senate as will support his establishment. The item of $15,000 for an expenditure of this sort is nothing new or surprising to the Senate. The Senate were not appalled at the appropriation of a much larger sum of money to a public printer who had much less right to it than the printer now elected by the Senate has. A few years ago you had the contract system; and a printer having entered into his contract, knowing precisely at what rates he was to be paid, yet, after he had completed the term of his contract, asked for more compensation, and you voted him some $50,000 or $60,000 in addition to the contract price for which he had undertaken to do the printing. In other words, you determined to indemnify him for loss, and give him profits besides. I do not think, therefore, that it becomes the Senate, who have bestowed a gratuity by way of indemnity upon one printer, to object now to providing, at an expense of about one fourth what we then thought not at all objectionable, for putting our printer in an independent position.

Mr. HUNTER. My friend from Maryland will allow me to say that the amount is not $15,000, but only one third of that, or $5,000, according to the statement of the Senator from Maine himself. The increased expense will only be double composition for the Senate work.

Mr. PEARCE. Then it is so much the better for my argument.

Mr. HAMLIN. The increase will be $15,000.

Mr. PEARCE. I say that, taking it at $15,000, it does not furnish, with me, any objection to the amendment. We have a printer of our own; and if we continue to have a printer of our own, we must furnish him with the means of an independent support. We must not allow the whole profit and patronage of the public printing to be diverted to the printer of the other House. If we do that, we may as well give up our public printer, and ask the House of Representatives to elect him for us.

Now, sir, as it is very clear that the present provision operates (whether from accident or design it matters not) so as to bestow greater profits from this patronage on one printer, and take, in the same proportion, from the other, it is the duty of this body, if it means to maintain its independence, to rectify that evil, and to put the matter upon such a footing, that the printer of the Senate may have a fair share of the public printing, or may do, at least, whatever we may choose to order.

Besides, there is another consideration in this matter which, it strikes me, is of importance, and which we lost sight of in the original law. When we direct printing to be done for us, which goes to the printer of the other House, we have not exactly that control over him that we should have over the same printing if executed by our own printer. We can dismiss our own printer. We can, at all events, do something in the way of expediting the printing of this House, if it should be improperly delayed, which we cannot do by our own action if that printing is to be done by the printer of the other House. I think the Constitution seems to contemplate that each House should regulate and manage its own proceedings; and I do not know why the execution of our public printing should not be regarded as one of those proceedings which properly, peculiarly, and exclusively belongs to the Senate itself. I think it does. I think, at all events, that it is proper in itself that we should not only have our own public printer, but that we should have our own printing done by him, so that we have control over him and over it. If it does cost a little more money, I think, at all events, that those Senators who were so liberal a few years ago (and I do not mean to reproach them for it) to a printer under the contract system, will not object now to doing that which is simple justice to our own officer and to ourselves.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, my objections to the present course are slightly different from those of the honorable Senator from Maryland. The very exposition which the honorable Senator from Maine has given, is a sufficient reason with me for voting for this amendment. It shows that there is a scramble for the patronage connected with the printing between the two Houses, and probably the Executive too, for aught I know; but we have not heard much about that. I think $15,000 would not be thrown away if it would prevent the state of feeling arising from such a scramble. I think harmony between the two bodies is far more important than any consideration of an expense of that kind. There is, also, an additional argument in the fact that that state of feeling would be further increased by continuing the present plan. When a document is ordered by one House in the first instance, of course it is first supplied that House, and, until the entire supply for it is exhausted, the other House is not furnished at all. I take it for granted that is one of the results of the present course, and it therefore produces confusion. I think the whole system a bad one. I hope it will be amended. But while it lasts, I am satisfied that such an amendment as this is necessary when two different printers are elected, one by each House.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Maryland has stated correctly the main argument in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. So far as I am concerned, I am very frank to admit that there is great difficulty in the execution of the present law, and it perhaps may need some amendment; but I think it can be modified without the expense which will be consequent upon the alteration proposed by this amendment. The Senator from Virginia, by the remark which he made to the Senator from Maine, seemed to suppose that the $15,000 additional expense stated by the Senator from Maine, as the result of this provision, included the composition for the work both of the House and of the Senate. Now, sir, by reference to the statement of the Superintendent, it will be seen that it does not include the House work, but that, beyond that, there will be an additional expense of $15,000, if the law be altered in the manner contemplated by this amendment.

But, sir, the Senator from South Carolina has given a wider latitude to the discussion of this amendment than I had apprehended, and he has gone back to a matter which has been pending before the Senate for some months back, perhaps. I recollect that shortly after I had the honor of being placed on the Committee on Printing, a proposition came before them to recommend the printing of fifty thousand copies of the census report in a condensed form. The committee concurred in the propriety of that, and so reported to this body, and the Senate agreed to their report. The Senator from South Carolina has assigned his reasons—of course they are satisfactory to him, and I presume they are to the Senate—why he made the motion to reconsider that vote; and I have nothing to say in regard to it.

Sir, the principal cause which has placed the census report in its present attitude, and which has delayed, up to this time, the action of the printers upon the volume ordered by this body, results from the peculiar law now regulating the printing of our documents, and the fact that there have been two printers elected, one by the Senate and one by the House. In order to show that the calculation of an increased expense of $15,000 does not affect the House printing, but relates only to the Senate printing, I will take the case now under consideration. The Superintendent says that the adoption of this provision will require an increase of $15,000 in the item of composition alone.

Mr. HUNTER. I admit, after hearing the matter explained, that the Senator is right; and if the Superintendent be correct, it will add $15,000.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I take it for granted that the Superintendent's statement is correct, though I have not examined it myself.

Mr. HUNTER. I have my doubts about it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Hence the statement of the Superintendent corroborates what I said when I first addressed the Senate upon this subject. The facts and the arguments ought properly to have been stated by the chairman of the committee; but when the question was about to be taken, I saw that he was not in his seat, and therefore I felt disposed to make the few remarks which I submitted before, in opposition to the amendment.

Now, sir, I know nothing of the scramble, if there is any, for plunder, or for patronage, to use a milder phrase, between the two Houses, the Departments, and the printers. I believe there is none. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the Commissioner of Patents, but I take it for granted, from his high character, and from what I have heard of him, that he would not descend to be a party to any such scramble. I must say, however, that I think the law, as it now stands, does produce embarrassment, and I do not wish to be understood as opposing a modification of it, for I think it should be modified. But I believe it can be amended without incurring the expense which will necessarily attend the adoption of the provision contained in this amendment. I concede that in high party times an officer in this Department or of that may have his favorite, and by that mode of indirection deprive this body, or the other House, of the right of giving to its printer the work which legitimately belongs to him.

Let me illustrate what I mean when I say the law needs amendment. The mechanical portion of the Patent Office Report was first ordered to be printed by this body. According to the interpretation now contended for by some gentlemen, it is to follow, as a matter of course, that the printing of the agricultural portion of that report is also to go to the printer of the Senate, who is entitled to the printing of the mechanical portion. If that be the game which is to be played, so far from the printer of the House receiving nine tenths of the work, as is alleged, the fact will be that one of the best jobs of printing to be given out by either branch of Congress is to be thrown into the hands of the Senate printer; for, if I am not mistaken, one hundred thousand copies of that are to be printed. It is an adjourned question, still undetermined, as to which of the printers is entitled to this printing.

I think this fact, together with the trouble in relation to the census compendium, shows that there is great necessity for a modification of the existing law; but I think we ought to make the needful alterations without entailing, as a standing expense upon the country, the amount which the statistics here show will necessarily result from this provision.

Now, sir, permit me to say, that so far as my knowledge extends, I am not aware that there has been any chicanery or management in any quarter to bestow work upon this or that printer. Neither the printer of this body nor of the House has opened his mouth to me in reference to the public printing, so far as I remember. I may have heard the subject mentioned by outsiders, or gentlemen who may have had connection with the matter, though I am not conscious of that; but, so far as the printers are concerned, I can say that neither of them has approached me upon the subject. But in the discharge of my duties as a member of the Printing Committee, I have been impressed with the belief that there should be some change in the law, by which the committees should be relieved from the annoyances under which they now labor. I ask again, cannot this be done without saddling upon the Treasury the annual expense which the amendment will involve?

I will not undertake to state the relative proportion of printing which has been bestowed on the printer of each branch. I am not sufficiently informed in regard to that, for I have not been on the committee for a great length of time. The present law, and the machinery under it, went into existence before I had the honor of a seat on this floor, and I have nothing to say in regard to it. But there is a contest pending before our committee which is undecided, as to which printer is entitled to two of the largest jobs ordered to be printed at this session. One is the agricultural portion of the Patent Office Report, and the other the Census Compendium, of which fifty thousand copies have been ordered. These officers may appeal to members of the committee. If gentlemen occupying the highest departments are to escape unscathed from all suspicions in this matter, I ask, how are gentlemen composing the committee to escape untouched from the suspicions and apprehension of those who feel so intensely upon the subject, as the respective printers naturally do?

These are the reasons which prompted me to say a few words to the Senate before, and they are reasons which, I think, should appeal to the reflection of every Senator on this floor. We say to you, that the execution of the law is surrounded with difficulties, that these difficulties are met at every point, and of course the larger a job, the more anxiety and the fiercer contest there is for the printing. Well, sir, as this body has, in its own wisdom, seen fit to select a printer, I am the last man, so far as I am concerned, to take advantage of any discretion which may be delegated to me by the law to withhold from the printer of this body his legitimate rights. According to my understanding of the law, and according to what is fair and right, I intend to give that officer his due, but there are complicated and difficult questions connected with the subject which embarrass the committee, and will continue to do so until the law is modified in some form. Still, I cannot consent to this amendment, which will incur such an additional expense. I know the great weight of the argument of the Senator from Maryland has been as to the amount of expense; and I have heard it said on this floor, that the Treasury is in the condition of a robust patient, needing depletion. I venture to say, that if the various jobs which I see carving out shall be carried through, before the close of the session the patient will require tonic medicines and repletion, instead of depletion. It may be said that this is a small matter; but, sir, when a proposition is made which draws money unnecessarily from the Treasury, I think it is my duty, not only to raise my voice against it, but to shield the Treasury in every form I can.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator from Alabama, has, I think, furnished the most conclusive reason for the immediate adoption of the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, sir; I say I am in favor of modifying the law, but without increasing the expense, as will be done by this amendment.

Mr. BADGER. I did not say what the Senator's argument was, but what he proved. The Senator told us that, as the law now stands, two of the largest jobs of printing, as he calls them, have been ordered, and the Committee on Printing are totally unable to decide to which of the printers their printing belongs. As we used to say in college, they are "graveled," and cannot come to a conclusion.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, sir; let me explain.

Mr. BADGER. I have no objection to the Senator's explaining when I get through, but really I have a word to say myself.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. One proposition was stopped by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BADGER. I give it up. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I intended simply to say that the proposition to print fifty thousand copies of the Census Compendium had been followed by a motion to reconsider, and that motion had been laid upon the table. I alluded to that as a matter undisposed of.

Mr. BADGER. If the Senator had waited he would have seen that I was meeting the precise point which he made. He says, that under the law as it now stands you cannot tell who is entitled to this printing.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, sir; I did not say that.

Mr. BADGER. The gentleman will allow me to go on, and he can correct me when I am through. I am sure he did state in regard to some printing of something, (I do not care what it was,) the committee could not tell, under the law as it now stands, which printer was entitled to it. Am I right in that?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, sir.

Mr. BADGER. Then there was something about which the committee were ignorant, and could not come to a conclusion. It was either printing or it was not printing. If it was about printing the amendment clearly meets the difficulty, because, after its adoption he that runs may read, and every one will be able to interpret the law so as to tell who shall do the printing of each House. If the difficulty was not about the distribution of printing I have nothing to say in regard to it, because I do not see that it concerns this subject.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My remark was, that there were jobs which had caused embarrassment in the committee, and which were adjourned and unsettled questions. I did not say that the committee were unable to determine the law. I presume that when we come to act we shall interpret the law as we understand it. But there are unsettled questions before the committee in regard to printing, and I referred to them.

Mr. WELLER. Will the Senator from Alabama answer me this: If this amendment had been the law no difficulty of this sort could possibly have existed?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Of course not.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope now that we shall be able to take the vote.

Mr. STUART. I suppose that inasmuch as the Senator from Virginia has spoken two or three times on the question he will not be in very great haste about taking the vote; but will allow me to state some two or three reasons why I shall vote against the amendment.

This is not, perhaps, the first occasion upon which gentlemen of good intentions have differed upon precisely the same ground. The Senator from North Carolina, when he introduced this proposition, said that he did it for the purpose of avoiding an undignified contest with the House of Representatives. Now, sir, I think it is the best means which could possibly be introduced to further that contest, and to further it upon this very bill. If the chairman of the Committee on Finance wants to pass this bill in season through this Congress, the best thing he can do is, if possible, to prevent this amendment from being attached to it. If there is anything in the argument, if there is any such fact as Senators seem to suppose, if there is a contest between the two Houses of Congress growing out of this subject, I ask what prospect is there that the House of Representatives will yield their side of it? Sir, it is intimated here that officers in the House of Representatives are connected with one side of this question; that they have a pecuniary interest in the public printing. If they have they will certainly not yield on this point.

Mr. WELLER. Who intimated that?

Mr. STUART. I really cannot undertake to say who did it; but it has been done. Now let us see whether there is any prospect of success in that branch of the argument. I will undertake to show that there is just as little validity in the argument which is used in respect to this amendment in another quarter. It is said that the Senate having elected a printer are bound to see that he is paid. How did it ever happen that the Senate became bound, because they elected a printer, to see that he was paid, and was not compelled to fail? I ask Senators to reflect upon that argument for a moment; when did the Senate ever assume that obligation?

Mr. WELLER. I think the Senator from Michigan is mistaken. He does not state the argument correctly. We have assumed the ground that when we elect a printer we are under an obligation to give him the printing of whatever documents we may choose to order, and not leave it to the discretion of the Superintendent or anybody else to decide whether he or the printer to the other House shall get the printing which we order.

Mr. STUART. I think I can satisfy the Senator from California in a few words, if he will look at this matter fairly, that his present statement of the proposition is as much without foundation as the one which I stated. We elect a printer under this law of Congress, and before he accepts that election he knows what is the law, for he is bound to know it. He knows, too, that the seventh section, which is now proposed to be repealed, stands in the law. It was put there for purposes of economy, and for sound economy. It is a portion of that law to which his election and office are subject. And I say, that the fact of our having elected a separate printer from the House furnishes no reason for changing the law.

Sir, this case stands, so far as this amendment is concerned, upon precisely the same ground, in point of principle, that it would stand if it were a proposition to pay the printer to the Senate $15,000 more than the law gives him.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is it.

Mr. STUART. That, in point of principle, is exactly the effect of it. We may talk round about the question as we like, but that is the naked proposition as it stands before the Senate. It is, that, according to the seventh section of the law of 1852, as it stands, this printer does not get as much as he ought to get, and now it is proposed to repeal that section of the law at an additional cost to the Government of $15,000 per Congress; and it is giving that amount to the Senate printer in order to sustain him.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know but that it may be somewhat wrong to oppose this proposition; but I should like to know of the Senate if the evil complained of does not lie at our own door? Was there any necessity for the Senate electing a separate printer from the House? Did this act contemplate anything except this: that, in the political mutations of the country, it might happen that the political character of the Senate would be one way, and the political character of the House the other way; and that, in that event, each House should elect its own printers, and that those printers should be different men? That is the reason why this provision in the law exists; and I apprehend it is the only reason. I hope no Senator will understand me as going back to review the election of a printer for the Senate, or to say aught for or against it. I do not mean to touch that subject at all; but I mean to say that whatever evil has grown out of the execution of this law, which is a sound law in point of economy, is attributable to the action of the Senate in electing a printer. It might have been avoided, and it can always be avoided.

Sir, is not the law a sound one? Is not the very section which is now sought to be repealed one of the soundest, in point of economy, that was ever introduced into any law? It is, that in the event of there being a separate printer for each House of Congress, when each House shall order a given document to be printed, the printer of the House by which the document is first ordered to be printed shall print it; so as to save the additional expense of its recomposition. Is it not sound? In other words, the question now is, shall the public Treasury of the United States be subjected to this additional expense for the purpose of sustaining an "organ," for that is about all there is of it?

I have been unable to see much reason in the argument of the Senator from Maryland; and I say so with all respect to him. He says, the fact that this will involve an additional expense of $15,000 furnishes to his mind no objection to voting for the amendment. I think the argument would be equally sound, and unquestionably would be adopted by the Senator with equal ability, if the amount were $30,000. It means this, and only this; and this is all the argument which is to be made here to-day, as I have been able to understand it: that the Senate having elected a printer, they mean, so far as their action is concerned, to sustain him at one rate or another. I intend to treat him just as I would treat any gentleman in the office—I mean to give him the benefits of the law under which he is elected, but to do no more.

I said before that it had been stated there were indecent scrambles—or some such term was used—between the officers of the Houses, or the respective printers, as to which House should first order a document to be printed. I prefer to allow these indecent scrambles to remain entirely where they are. They are unbecoming a member of either House. I am not willing to believe that a member of either House would lend himself to aid them in any degree; but if individual members do, I do not propose that either House, as a body, shall become tarnished with it. If there is anything of this sort—and I am not disposed to deny it, for I must confess that the estimate which I hold of either of the "organs" in this city is not a very high one by any means—but if there is anything of this sort existing, let it stand where it is. These public printers are entitled to just exactly what the law gives them; they were elected upon that basis and they are not entitled to anything more; at least that is my judgment. I have been unable to see why they should be given more. I have been unable to see why a controversy, such as existed before in the last Congress, at least in the House of Representatives, should be renewed again.

The members of the last House of Representatives suffered a little on account of just such a controversy as this. It was a long time before any printer could be elected to the House of Representatives, and what was the result? Why, sir, the documents which that House ordered for itself have been voted by the present members to themselves. The order was made at the close of the last Congress. The printing of the documents could not be completed until the present Congress convened, and the gentlemen composing it determined that inasmuch as they had got the subject within their control they would order the Clerk of the House to distribute the documents to them. I do not apprehend a much more successful result to this controversy, let it end as it may; and I believe that it will endanger this very deficiency bill, by a controversy which will be got up between the two Houses. I have no doubt it will delay the final passage of the bill very much. I fear it may lead to certain results, by way of committees of conference, which are seldom happy upon an appropriation bill; for the experience of the country will show, that when a committee of conference makes a report upon appropriations, the two Houses, in nine cases out of ten, and perhaps in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, agree to the report; and provisions are put into appropriation bills in that way which, separately, could not command a majority of either House of Congress. All that I wish to avoid, so far as I am concerned.

I confess that from the discussion which has been had in the Senate I fear this proposition will prevail here. All that I can do, having stated my reasons for opposing the amendment, will be to vote against it. I hope, however, that the law will not be changed, for I have been unable to see any sufficient reason for it.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to suggest an amendment to the amendment as it stands, for the purpose of meeting the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Maine with regard to its operation upon the printing already ordered. As the yeas and nays have been ordered, I cannot modify the amendment without the consent of the Senate, and I therefore move to amend it so as to strike out the word "for," and insert "which may hereafter be ordered by," so that it shall read, "each shall do the printing which may hereafter be ordered by the House electing him."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. I simply wish to make one remark in reply to the Senator from Michigan. We all know that the printers are entitled under this law to just what the law gives them, and nothing more; but I suppose that is not a very good reason why we should not alter the law if we find that in its practical operation it does injustice.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I consider the practical view of this question. We have a printer for the Senate, who is an officer of this body. Now, unless we have the means of giving him an income from the work which he does for us, sufficient to make it an object to him to perform our printing, we shall deprive ourselves practically of the privilege of electing that officer. My friend from Virginia said that there was a scramble for the public printing. My objection is that there is not a scramble at all. If I understood correctly, the members of the Joint Committee on Printing, on the part of the Senate, are not over friendly to the Senate printer, and if their feelings were consulted, I apprehend that both my honorable friends on that committee, who have spoken, have already indicated by their speeches that they would prefer the printing to go to the printer of the House.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman pardon me for a moment, as he alludes to me? I do not think my remarks are susceptible of the interpretation which he gives them. I do not think I expressed a preference for either the printer of the Senate or of the House. I remarked that I was friendly to both gentlemen, and had but a limited acquaintance with each. I did not say whether I had a preference for one or the other, but I have a very high regard for both.

Mr. PRATT. I infer that the House have appointed a committee, the members of which are desirous of giving all the patronage they can to their printer. Without assuming, then, that my friends—the members of the Joint Committee on Printing, appointed by the Senate—have any preferences at all, I presume that those appointed by the House have. What is the result? Here is a joint committee, and they are to decide whether this, that, or the other document is to be printed. The House members of that committee have their preferences; they have their desire to have all the patronage go to their printer. The members of the committee on the part of the Senate have no preferences. The consequence is that there is a scramble on the part of the House members to give patronage to their printer, and no scramble on the part of the committee of the Senate to give it to ours. The result is—

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say to the Senator—

Mr. PRATT. I am now speaking upon a case of mere hypothesis, but a hypothesis which you will readily see, sir, may take place. I say, the amendment of my friend from North Carolina ought to be adopted, for the purpose of preventing the possibility of such an occurrence. The case which I put is one which may occur.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir; it cannot occur.

Mr. PRATT. I submit, contrary to the opinion of my friend, that it may occur. He says it cannot occur. Why, sir, if, as I suppose, those gentlemen who are appointed members of the joint committee on the part of the House are desirous of giving the printing to the printer of the House; and if, as I assume, further, my honorable friend from Maine, and his colleague on the committee on the part of the Senate, do not care whether the printing goes to the printer of the Senate or not, they can, by not making their report, or the committee on the part of the House by hurrying their report forward before our committee make theirs, can undoubtedly give all the printing to the printer to the House.

Now, sir, it is right in itself that, if we appoint our own officer, the work which we order to be done should be done by him, so that he may receive the compensation which is legitimately to be derived from that work. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to correct the Senator from Maryland in one important particular. The law provides that all questions of printing in the House shall be decided by the House committee irrespective of the members from the Senate, and all questions of printing in the Senate are decided by the Senate committee irrespective of the House committee; therefore the Senate part of the committee have nothing whatever to do in relation to what is or what is not ordered to be printed in the House, nor have the House committee anything to do in relation to what is ordered in the Senate. We are separate committees for that purpose; made so by the law.

Mr. BADGER. But how as to the time of making the report for the printing?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] has indulged in an argument upon the hypothesis that the committee on the part of the House of Representatives are anxious to give the printing to the printer of the House.

Mr. PRATT. That may be.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And he describes my honorable colleague on the committee [Mr. HAMLIN] and myself to be perfectly indifferent as to what is going on. I endeavored to correct the gentleman, and to impress upon him that I had avowed no preference for either printer; but, on the contrary, I said I had a regard for both those gentlemen. I did not say whether I had or had not a preference for either. I may have a preference, but I deem it improper and, perhaps, uncalled for here to express it; though, if it were necessary to do so I should do it. I think the argument in which the Senator from Maryland has indulged does injustice both to the honorable chairman of the committee and myself; for so far as I am concerned, and I bear testimony that so far as he is concerned, we have endeavored to do as ample justice to the printer of the Senate as well as the printer of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to reply to a suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, which did not meet my ear.

Mr. BADGER. Then how can you reply to it?

Mr. HAMLIN. It has been stated to me by another Senator who did hear it. I understand that the Senator made a suggestion of this character: as to the time when the respective committees reported.

Mr. BADGER. I will give the Senator what I said: Questions of printing are referred to the Committee on Printing of the two Houses. Under the law, as it now stands, the printer of the House which first orders the printing gets the whole printing of a document. It is, therefore, very manifest, that as the question who is to do the work depends upon which House first orders the work to be done, and as the question which House will first order the work to be done depends materially upon the Committee on Printing of which House first makes the report, and upon its being made, of course by the mode of making the reports and the time of making them, the public printing may be thrown altogether into the hands of one printer, and out of the hands of the other. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is altogether mistaken.

Mr. BADGER. It has been done in the instance cited by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is mistaken entirely. In relation to the ordinary printing of documents, all questions of printing documents ordered in the Senate go to the Senate committee. The House members of the committee have nothing to do with them. They do not meet us; they do not know the fact that such questions are referred to us. When printing is ordered in the House and extra numbers are asked for the proposition goes to the House committee, and we know nothing of it. When a resolution from either branch of Congress is referred to that committee for its joint action, then it would depend upon the report of the committee. Before the question of printing is referred in the Senate to the Senate committee, or in the House to the House committee, the printing is ordered, and it is only the question of printing extra numbers that goes to the committee, and therefore they only report back, in separate committees, as to the extra numbers. The House having ordered the printing, the question of extra numbers goes to the committee of that House. There is no case, therefore, except when a resolution goes to the committee directing them to have a work prepared, where the character of the printing is determined by their report. That has only been in one case at this session, and that report was made to the House of Representatives where the order had its origin.

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon the amendment of Mr. BADGER as amended, resulted—yeas 24, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clayton, Douglas, Everett, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Hunter, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Weller, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Slidell, Stuart, Wade, and Williams—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I desire to offer the following amendment, as an additional section to this bill:

SEC. —. And he it further enacted, That for custom-houses, and to complete the same, the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated:

For the purpose of completing the custom house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000.

To complete the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000.

To complete the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000.

To complete the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000.

To complete the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000.

To complete the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000.

To complete the custom house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000.

For the purchase of a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the Senator if these are estimated for by the Department?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir. Supposing that I might probably have to offer such an amendment, and that I might be cut off by the provision of the rule to which the Senator has referred, I have placed the amounts in exact conformity with the estimates, except that for the Wilmington custom-house. The printed estimate for that is $20,000, but the Secretary of the Treasury has since sent in a letter to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, reducing that estimate to $12,000.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I understand that a portion is not estimated for.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. No, sir; all these works are estimated for by the Department. Although I remarked jocularly last evening that perhaps this amendment would occupy three or four hours, I have to say that instead of that, thirty minutes, or even less, will be sufficient for me to present my views of the question, and to present the whole case to the Senate.

The Secretary of the Treasury, when he submitted his annual estimates, included these items; for by reference to Executive document of the House, No. 2, page 3, you will find that he recommended the following appropriations:

"Custom-Houses.

- "To complete the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000.
- "To complete the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000.
- "To complete the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000.
- "To complete the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000.
- "To complete the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000.
- "To completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000.
- "To complete the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $20,000.
- "To purchase a site for custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000."

These amounts are exactly those which I have fixed in my amendment, except as to the Wilmington custom-house, the estimate for which the Secretary has since reduced.

Before I proceed to speak particularly upon this amendment, I wish to make a few preliminary observations. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] the other day seemed to think estimates were sometimes made for the purpose of subserving the cause of demagogism in an approaching presidential election; but that objection cannot apply at all so far as this estimate is concerned. It can have no application to the present Secretary of the Treasury, because the first estimate which he has ever submitted upon the subject is that which is now before us. It is presented by the proper officer of the Administration in power. That Administration is backed by a majority in this and the other end of the Capitol.

I have submitted this amendment for the purpose of completing works which have been heretofore begun, but which are incomplete and cannot be finished. The very argument which the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] used yesterday, to induce us to adopt his amendment in relation to the aqueduct and the supply of water for this city, applies with equal force to these appropriations. These custom-houses have been commenced, and have been commenced by Administrations preceding this. On account of an increase in the cost of materials, and from unforeseen casualties, rendering it impossible that the whole cost of these works could be foreseen, these appropriations are now requisite. The appropriate officer to ascertain that fact now in power has recommended that this should be done. The amendment is to provide for a deficiency which has occurred from an under estimate, if I may so say, of a Whig Administration—the one which preceded this.

The present Secretary of the Treasury is a man with whom I would venture to trust any question as to the expenditure of money. Whatever may be said of him otherwise, and however I may differ from him in politics, I venture to say, that if you take his history as a politician in the State of Kentucky, if you take his course in the Legislature of that State in relation to our State finances, and if you take his administration of the financial affairs of the city of Louisville, or take even his own personal financial management of his own concerns, he is the last man in the world to be lavish, profligate, and imprudent; and if I could ever trust a man in reference to safety, propriety, and economy in the expenditure of money, I would trust him, though I differ from him politically. He has estimated for these works.

Well, sir, the House of Representatives it seems, after these estimates were submitted to them, refused to allow them. I contend that it is necessary and proper that these appropriations should be made. They are intended to complete works which are now in progress. This is the beginning of the working season, and unless you make the appropriations now the works which have been commenced will be subject to exposure and to dilapidation, and it may cost more ultimately to finish them, than it will cost if this be done now. If you do not commence at the proper season to go on with the works, and if you compel the officers to wait until the passage of the general appropriation bills, (which I suppose will be some time in next September or October, if they ever pass at all,) the entire working season will be lost. The Senator at the head of the Committee on Finance may then say to us, you must delay this matter longer, for you cannot commence the work in the winter, and there is no reason why the appropriations should not be deferred until next season. This is the argument with which we may be met, if we do not insist upon these appropriations being made now. I hope we shall insert the appropriations now. This is the proper time and the proper place.

I know it is bruited about and said, by adopting this amendment we shall be weighing the bill down. How weighing it down? What have you put on it already? You inserted yesterday a statute of frauds and perjuries against invalid pensioners, a thing not at all germane to it, and which I think really ought to have been ruled out of order. That is a proposition which I venture to say would not have been entertained twenty years ago; for I was told by a distinguished Democrat this morning that twenty years ago such a thing as a statute of frauds and perjuries against invalid pensioners would have been laughed out of Congress if offered as an amendment to an appropriation bill. You put on that. You not only put on that proposition but you inserted an appropriation of $500,000 for the construction of an aqueduct, and for bringing water into this city; and these $500,000 were appropriated as a sort of deficiency to $100,000 heretofore appropriated for that purpose. That was upon an estimate that the work would cost altogether $2,300,000 to the Government, without any corporate assistance from this city, for which we are to bring in water. I suppose, however, that, like the construction of most public works, public vessels, and other things undertaken by the Government, the cost will eventually fall not much short of $10,000,000. At any rate you put on that proposition; yet now objection is made when I propose to appropriate $100,000, which is a real deficiency, to complete the custom-house at the city of St. Louis, where my friend from Missouri, who sits beside me [Mr. GREEN] lives. After the extravagant items to which I have referred have been tacked to the bill, you say you will not appropriate that sum to complete the custom-house at that important point, now, in the working season, when it is necessary that the appropriation should be made immediately. Although you know what vast commerce is concentrated at that city, and although you know that from the head waters of the Mississippi to New Orleans all the States in that valley are interested in such an accommodation for the transaction of their commercial business, you come and say that these people shall not have such an appropriation, that they are not entitled to it.

It is not only proposed to reject these custom-house appropriations for the large cities in the valley of the Mississippi, but they are objected to when proposed for Providence, Rhode Island, and for Wilmington, Delaware. Those cities are in small States. The "Blue Hen's chickens," and little chicks of that sort, are never to get a crumb or to pick up anything; but still you can appropriate your two and three millions for bringing water into this city; and you can vote away two hundred millions of acres of land in alternate sections for railroads. Still you cannot complete custom-houses which have been commenced at St. Louis, Louisville, Cincinnati, Wilmington, Bangor, and other places where they are necessary for the convenient transaction of the business of the Government, and to enable the citizens to get out their clearances and manifests without delay. Although the commerce of the country is largely interested in having proper accommodations, you cannot make them these little appropriations, not amounting to as much as you have already voted, as a mere mite, to bring water into the city of Washington! Is this just? Is it fair?

Mr. President, I have such a cold that I speak to-day with great difficulty; but there are some other matters to which I wish to allude. Here sits the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] before me. I know he desires to introduce an amendment for the very necessary purpose of rebuilding the custom-house at Portland, which has been burned down. I shall vote for an appropriation to rebuild that custom-house whether I fail in my purpose or not; or whether it be tacked to mine by way of an amendment or not. I believe, also, that the Senators from California are entitled to, and ought to have, an appropriation for the custom-house at San Francisco. I have not, however, included these, as I have preferred to present the amendment for precisely such works as have been estimated for by the Department itself, at the commencement of the session, as deficiencies. Do the House of Representatives and the Senate intend to abandon the Administration? Has the Administration made these estimates to humbug Buncombe? Have these estimates been made in order to tell the people of St. Louis and Louisville, "we will fool you; we will cheat you, by an exhibit of a purpose, but as to the cash you are not to have a dollar?" I want to know if this is to be done when you are voting away millions for railroads, in the shape of public lands?

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I will vote against your amendment if you do not let the railroads alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I suppose I shall get votes enough against me, in all probability, to kill my proposition anyhow, for there seems to be a desire on the part of some gentlemen to vote it down. But, sir, look at the points in the valley of the Mississippi, for which I propose these appropriations. Look at St. Louis. Look at the vast commerce which centers there from Tennessee, Louisiana, and Mississippi, up to Iowa and Wisconsin. Look at the vast region interested in the appropriation for the Louisville custom-house. Then look to the disastrous calamities to life and property which are daily and almost hourly occurring to the people of that great region, because you do not improve the navigation of their great streams. Still, when they ask this poor boon, that you should complete a custom-house which you have commenced, as a convenience to their merchants and to their boatmen, to ease them in their shipments, will the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. JONES] oppose it? I think not. He was born in Indiana, and raised in Kentucky, and he cannot, I am sure, vote against this proposition. But further, I tell you now, and I shall do so more fully at another time, when you lavish your money upon other portions of the Union, and all over the country except there, the people of that section will feel that if you reject this little boon they are regarded like an outside barbarian was, when brought into a Roman arena, and their interests are to be slaughtered, as those gladiators were, for the amusement of others who controlled them.

The men living along the Kentucky, the Wabash, the Tennessee, the Red river, and the Arkansas river want the snags removed from those great channels of commerce. They want conveniences for doing the business which they have to transact at the custom-houses of the country. You have lavished your millions everywhere else; and yet, when we ask for these appropriations, the public policy and the public propriety of them are regarded as entitled to no consideration, and no weight. Is this to be said at a time when the party in power in this House, and in the other branch of Congress, has a large, predominant, overruling majority, sufficient to carry this appropriation if they will? Will they not do it upon the recommendation of their own Administration? I think you have got an honest, sensible Secretary of the Treasury, and I think rather cleverly of your President. You are in power here. You can overrule us. I am willing to vote for the custom-houses that are necessary in California, in Maine, and in Delaware. I ask gentlemen if, with their predominant party strength in both Houses, they will endanger the bill in the other branch of Congress by attaching to it the estimates of their own Administration? I think there is no danger of the bill being lost in the other House.

I suppose that, hypothetically, and by way of supposition, I may allude to that House. A fourth of the year has now gone by, and suppose the House of Representatives should continue, as they have been doing, not because they are ambitious young gentlemen, or cannot find game high enough to fly a hawk at; but suppose they consume the other two thirds of the year, from considerations of moral duty and the force of patriotism, in answering speeches made in this wing of the Capitol; are you certain that you will get any general appropriation bill passed? If you cannot tack on these appropriations to this bill, for which they were estimated, how are you to get them into a bill for which they were not estimated, and for which they were not recommended? Not only that, but I presume, as has been the habit of some former Congresses, this House has talked now about as much as they see fit for economy; and if they get into a collision with the Senate, as they are modest, clever, young gentlemen, they can excuse themselves to the people by saying they were forced into this.

It seems to me that a simple, pure proposition to complete public works, which will suffer if the money is not appropriated soon, ought to be adopted without difficulty. This Administration is not responsible for these works; but the Secretary of the Treasury, from mere economy and a sense of public duty, has advised us to make the appropriations to complete them. When he has done that, it is strange and singular that those on this side of the Chamber have to come up and insist on appropriating what is necessary for the exigencies of the public service, when it might have been expected that we would take exceptions to everything done by the Administration. There may be mysterious and occult reasons of State why the other side should reject it, but I have never seen, and I cannot perceive, and do not now discover, a sufficient ground for it. You have tacked on to the bill almost everything proposed, whether germane or not.

I am willing to vote for the bill according to the estimates. I have that much confidence in the Government that I should have voted for the deficiency bill just as it came from the Department; but when you tack on everything else, do not turn off the men of St. Louis, Louisville, Wilmington, Bath, and Cincinnati. When you have added forty collateral provisions, and put in fifty appropriations never thought of before, from your public printers down to your invalid pensioners, why refuse us what is fair and right? Sir, allow me to say, before I conclude, that I do not want the amendment, smothered to death by various other amendments, and I do not want it talked to death. I have said what I have to say about it. I have placed it upon its intrinsic merits and the recommendation of the Department, and the propriety of the measure itself. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I concur most cordially in what fell from the Senator's lips just as he took his seat. I would have voted for the bill just as it came from the Committee on Finance, and I would have preferred very much to vote for it in that way; but, inasmuch as they have added almost everything, pertinent as well as that which is not so, I shall vote for the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Kentucky to this bill. And in order that the matter may be fairly presented to the Senate, I shall offer an amendment to the amendment, including an appropriation for the custom-house site at San Francisco, and for rebuilding the custom-house at Portland, Maine; the one recommended by the Secretary, and the other reported by the committee. The sum named in my amendment is that which is deemed proper on conferring with the Treasury Department.

I know it has been said that this may defeat the bill in the House; but, sir, the question in the House will be one of a separate character—upon the amendments of the Senate, and not upon the original bill. I do not design to go into this matter at length, and I shall not do so. I offer the amendment for the California custom-house because it was connected with the other proposition before; and in regard to that it can be imagined that I have repeated the explanation which was given by my friend from Virginia the other day. In regard to the custom-house at Portland, it can be imagined that I repeat what I said in regard to it the other day. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky by adding to it the following:

For the purchase of a new site for the custom house in San Francisco, $250,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if, in his judgment, the public interest will thereby be promoted, to apply this appropriation, and as much as may be necessary of former appropriations, for the erection of a custom-house on the land reserved for said purpose, to the purchase of a building or buildings, for a custom-house and other public offices; and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take all legal proceedings which may be necessary or advisable to maintain and secure the possession and title of the United States to the lot heretofore selected for the site of a custom-house.

For the erection of a custom house at Portland, Maine, including rooms for the United States courts, and for a post office, $200,000.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to multiply words upon this proposition. I do not stand here to dispute the propriety of inserting in some other bill appropriations for the completion of these custom-houses; but I wish to remind the Senate that these are the identical appropriations which defeated the first deficiency bill in the House of Representatives. I wish to say to the friends of this measure that I believe they will stand a much better chance for carrying it on the general appropriation bills, or in a separate bill, than on this. I have no idea that they can carry it upon this bill, because I believe that if the House do not defeat the bill on account of it, they will reject the amendment. I think, therefore, the whole effect of adding the proposition will be to get up a contest between the two Houses, in which we shall have ultimately to abandon it, because I presume there are few here who would destroy the bill upon such a ground. It will not be a new contest gotten up by the House; for if we insert this, it will be done with a full knowledge of the fact that the House have determined, so far as their action in concerned, that it shall not go into this bill.

It may be said that the same reason would apply to a general appropriation bill. Not at all. We know that in regard to any deficiency bill many members entertain strong objections. I think there is to some extent a prejudice against deficiency bills. I believe there are many who do not appreciate the necessity which may sometimes exist for bringing in such a bill. There is therefore a certain vote cast against it from the nature of the bill itself. When you come to add those who object to it on account of its particular provisions, you endanger the passage of the bill. But, sir, a general appropriation bill has never failed. This bill has already failed once in the House, and it was restored by casting off the appropriations which are now embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I think it would be more prudent; I believe it would be better for the very purpose which the Senator from Kentucky has in view—that of obtaining some appropriations for custom-houses—to withdraw his amendment now, and to offer it to some of the general appropriation bills. They always pass, but this bill may be endangered.

Mr. GWIN. I have been very anxious since this deficiency bill came from the House, that we should put upon it nothing but what was palpably necessary. It came with the prestige of weakness from the other House; and I was desirous to load it as little as possible. Therefore, Mr. President, when the amendment was proposed, having reference to the custom-house at San Francisco, which was estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury as eminently proper and pressing; and when the Finance Committee, by a unanimous vote, had offered it as an amendment to the bill, and an amendment, which also was eminently proper, was offered to it, it was supposed, as I thought, by the Finance Committee that it might jeopardize the bill to put on it even such proper amendments as these for such proper objects, and consequently I was instructed by the committee to withdraw the amendment, and the amendment proposed to it fell, as a matter of course. I intended to carry that principle out to the end. I did not intend to load the bill down even with amendments for such proper objects as these, because I thought it right to put it in such a form as that it might pass easily through the other House with what necessary amendments we should make.

But, yesterday, when the proposition came forward to give $500,000 to bring water into the city of Washington, the chairman of our committee [Mr. HUNTER] gave way, and now I am, for one, for putting on everything for which there is a necessity.

Mr. HUNTER. The proposition was made to put in the water appropriation. I voted for it. I did so because it was estimated for by the Department; because I had always been in favor of introducing water into the city; and because, if the work was to go on, it was better to put it upon this bill, and save a year's work, than wait until the general appropriation bill came up. I ask the Senator if he was not in favor of the water appropriation?

Mr. GWIN. I am in favor of it now. I stated, yesterday, that I would vote for it on the general appropriation bill; but I was opposed to putting it on this bill. The Senator, too, in his place here voted for it; and I now say, that these appropriations are as proper to be introduced into the bill as the one for the introduction of the water. I was for an appropriation for that object last year. I am for it now; and I am for these custom-houses, too.

Mr. HUNTER. The difference between the two is this: we know that the custom-houses have endangered the bill; we know that they did once defeat it. We do not know that the water appropriation will defeat it, or ever has done it. But the Senator from California knows that I objected when it was proposed to me in the Finance Committee to put it on as an amendment, not because I was against it as an appropriation, but because I was afraid that it would endanger the bill; but when it was proposed in the Senate as an amendment, which was not supposed to be against the sentiment of the House, why should I vote against it, if I was in favor of the appropriation?

Mr. GWIN. I do not go to the House of Representatives to inquire how I ought to vote. I know that if this water appropriation is passed through the House, the custom-house appropriations ought to do so also. That is my opinion. This being a deficiency bill, and for the first time in the history of the Government such a bill having been defeated in the other House, after it was matured in the Committee of the Whole, owing to the appropriations for these custom-houses—so I am told, and I presume truly—it was a warning to the Senate to put as little as possible upon it. The committee which is responsible to this body for the recommendation of appropriations took that warning, as I thought, and although it was supposed that my State was deeply interested, and even made an exception to the other States, in these custom-house appropriations, I acquiesced, and we withdrew the amendment which we had offered. But now, sir, I undertake to say that it is as important to put in the bill the appropriations for the custom-houses as it is to vote $500,000 to bring water into the city of Washington to enhance the value of property in the city; and so long as that amendment remains in the bill I shall vote for every estimate which is brought forward by the Department—every one, and I hope they will every one of them be put in the bill. I want it distinctly understood that I am in favor of the water appropriation. I am perhaps a little more so than those who talk more about it. I voted for it originally. I shall vote to put it in another bill hereafter; but I am not for extending a favor to this city which is not extended to the western cities, for improvements which they look upon as equally important as the introduction of water into this city, which, as we all know, will add immensely to the value of property, in the city, while the property holders contribute nothing towards bringing it in. I am willing to be liberal to the city; but I want the liberality to look beyond the city; and I do not want the bill loaded down with amendments of such a description as that water appropriation for this city, while appropriations necessary for other sections of the country are excluded.

Now, sir, I have been anxious—more anxious than any other member of the body, because I have a greater interest in questions which are coming up, and more responsible than any other for them—to get this bill through, but there have been measures put into it which have made it an omnibus, and which will delay its final passage for some time to come; and I think, as we are making an omnibus of it, it is well enough to take care of the western appropriations which are estimated for by the Department, and which are right and proper in themselves, so far as I know. I shall vote for the whole of them.

Mr. PRATT. If I looked upon the question as my friend from California does, with the view which he takes of the two appropriations, and with a desire to support the appropriations recommended by the Department, I might vote as he intends to vote. But I submit to him whether the water appropriation does not differ from any of those which he has now spoken of? I submit it to his candor. We are only opposed to putting in the bill the appropriations for the various works suggested by my friend from Kentucky, for the reason that we believe they would occasion the defeat of the bill in the House. Why do we believe so? The honorable Senator from California says, that if the House defeat the bill because of those appropriations, then the amendment which we adopted yesterday ought also to defeat it. He also says, that he does not go to the House for the purpose of ascertaining whether he should vote for this appropriation or that. I apprehend that the Senator from Virginia, who voted for the water appropriation yesterday, is as little apt to go there as the honorable Senator from California. But, sir, there is no necessity to go there for the purpose of learning what their views are in regard to the class of amendments offered by the Senator from Kentucky. We all know that when the first deficiency bill of this session was in the House, it contained the very class of appropriations now proposed on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to be put in this bill, and for that reason it was rejected. The appropriation proposed to be made by the amendment which we agreed to yesterday was not placed in that bill. We therefore do not know but that it may meet with the concurrence of the House. We know with certainty that if you place the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky in this bill it defeats it. We do not know that the amendment which we adopted yesterday will have that effect. I submit therefore to the candor of my honorable friend to say whether there is not a distinction between that amendment upon which the sense of the House has not been taken and this one in reference to which they have already decided?

Mr. BAYARD. I have one or two words to say upon this question; and I must again differ from my honorable friend from Maryland. This is an appropriation bill; but it is called the deficiency bill. I presume that the true line of distinction as to the propriety of placing an appropriation in it, or reserving it for a general appropriation bill, must depend upon whether there has been any unforeseen reason why any appropriation should be now made which connects itself with the preceding appropriations by a previous Congress. That I presume to be the general ground of passing beforehand a deficiency bill, connected with the appropriations of the current fiscal year, instead of that which commences on the first of July next. If, then, these appropriations, under the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, can be brought within that principle, there is but one other objection which can be made to their adoption—that is, the objection made by the honorable Senator from Maryland, of the danger of these appropriations defeating the bill in the House. I shall address myself to both points.

As to the first: The Congress of the United States, at a previous session, authorized the building of the custom-houses. At the commencement of the present session the Secretary of the Treasury, under whose charge their building is placed, reports to you specifically as to certain custom-houses, that, owing to the rise in the price of materials and other unexpected events, they could not be completed according to the original demand, and specifications, and designs of the Department, under the appropriations which have been made; but that he had made agreements which would provide for their construction, with the stipulation with the contractors that those agreements might be carried out so as to make an inferior work, unless Congress were pleased to appropriate to carry them out according to the original design. The Secretary, therefore, has performed his duty. He has left the matter in this condition. He has expedited the construction of the buildings to the utmost extent of his power.

They are all more or less advanced; and the whole question to be decided is whether, in consequence of the unexpected increase both in the prices of materials and the rates of wages during the last year and a half, we will make an appropriation to carry out the original plan. Inasmuch as the buildings cannot be constructed in a fire-proof manner, according to the original estimates and designs, they must either be constructed in an inferior manner, not being fire-proof, or else they must be delayed for the whole of another year, though they are now in progress of construction. I ask whether that is not precisely a case that comes in point of time within a deficiency bill, and which would require that the appropriation should be made now instead of being postponed until the month of August or September, when the building year will nearly have passed?

I submit, therefore, that, according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, unless you say that these custom-houses ought not to be completed in a fire-proof manner, unless you say that you will not put them in an appropriation bill at all, they are a class of works which, from their position, peculiarly require that they should go into the deficiency bill. I will take—because I am more familiar with it than with others, though I have no doubt that the same argument would apply precisely to other cases—the building authorized to be erected in my own city. The original appropriation was $25,237 98. The Secretary, in a report made to the Committee of Ways and Means in the House, which I hold in my hand, states that he has made a contract; that that building can be constructed, though not in a fire-proof manner, for the amount of the appropriation; but he thinks it is the interest of the Government to construct its buildings in a permanent and more durable manner, and therefore he gives an additional estimate of $12,000, making $37,237 98 in all. That building stands in this situation. Under the contract the foundation has been constructed, and the building stands in a position in which, at the opening of the season, the work could be resumed. The contractor must either proceed to make wooden girders or stone arches; in other words, he must either make the building fire-proof or not. Under his contract he has a right to go on and complete the building without making it fire-proof. That is one of the conditions of the contract. The Secretary had no authority except to make it contingent in that mode. If the amendment does not pass, and by so doing you postpone your action, the building must be constructed in an imperfect manner, if the contractor chooses to go on, because of the additional cost of $12,000 which you refuse. Is it not, then, a case which in point of time appeals to the propriety of the insertion of this amendment in what is called the deficiency bill, which connects itself with past appropriations, and in which, on account of an unforeseen contingency, the appropriation should be inserted enabling us to do it more speedily than by waiting for the general appropriation bill? If we wait for that the whole season will be lost.

I submit, therefore, that in point of fact, and of sound policy—I have no doubt the other custom-houses stand in the same position as the one to which I have alluded; for these are the reasons given by the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to them—they all connect themselves with precedent appropriations. The increase in the price of the lumber and labor being so great, arising from unexpected events since the custom-houses were authorized to be built, and the amount which is necessary for their construction according to the original designs being greater than the amount appropriated, the Department, I think very wisely, believing that it was far more important to the Government, that buildings of that character should be fire-proof, and of a permanent character, than that the difference of $200,000 or $300,000 should be saved in their construction, has recommended these additional appropriations, which are clearly deficiencies depending upon an unexpected event. I say, therefore, they address themselves to the intelligence of the Senate, as proper objects for a deficiency bill, far more strongly than the case of the Washington aqueduct. I voted in favor of that. I think it right that the work should progress; but there was no state of things requiring an immediate appropriation comparable at all to the case of the custom-houses. I have shown you the case of one in my own State. I have no doubt other Senators could show you others in their States. The building, at the mere will of the contractor, must go on, and be made in an imperfect manner; or, if unwilling to do that, and preferring to let it lie over, it must be postponed another year before it can be finished. In either case there is a loss to the Government. I submit, therefore, that I have made out a stronger case, not merely for the appropriations, but for their insertion in this deficiency bill, which is meant to provide for unexpected emergencies, than the case of the $500,000 voted for the Washington water-works, or the $75,000 for the bridge over the Potomac. There is no reason in either of those cases as strong for their insertion in this bill as there is for the insertion of these appropriations.

I come then to the other objection. The honorable Senator from Maryland says that you have the evidence that these appropriations, if inserted, will endanger the bill in the House, but that you have not the evidence that by the appropriation of half a million for the aqueduct it will be endangered. I have great deference for the other branch of the National Legislature. I place them precisely in the position which I think they ought to accord to us—equality, nothing more, nothing less. When a measure comes before me which I think right and proper in itself, although there may have been hasty action, as I have heard, elsewhere; although it may be that, after passing by decided majorities, every one of the custom-house appropriations in detail as proper measures they rejected the bill, I will not suppose, I will not do them the injustice to suppose, when the question comes before them as an amendment made by this body, that they will defeat the bill on account of it. The most that you can anticipate is that they will strike out the amendment. If they do that, it is time enough for us to determine whether we will place the fate of the bill on the amendment or not. But I would not so far derogate from the respect to which the House is entitled, as to suppose that they would kill the bill because we placed upon it an amendment. Of course, if they differ from us, they can reject the amendment. Then we can, through the medium of a committee of conference, or it will depend upon the will of the Senate, whether we think the amendment of sufficient importance to persist in it, and so hazard the fate of the bill. Its fate is not in question on the original adoption of the amendment. I submit, therefore, that an argument of that kind is inconclusive. It is not sound in itself. We have no right to anticipate such action as regards the other branch of Congress.

But, further, I deny that the honorable Senator from Maryland has authority to say that that bill was killed because of the custom-house appropriations being in it. There were other questions connected with it. You cannot know the motives of individual members. You do not know why that vote was given. There were a variety of opinions entertained, and I think the Senator from Maryland will recollect that there was in the bill an appropriation for New York. I know that there was a controversy between persons in regard to that. I have nothing to do with these personal controversies as to the Mint between New York and Philadelphia; but who shall tell me that they had no swaying influence in relation to the vote on the bill? I cannot answer these questions. I do not presume to say on what ground the other branch of the National Legislature defeated the bill, after they had, by decided majority, approved every one of the individual appropriations which are now asked to be inserted; but I take it for granted that, as men of sense, they did not defeat the bill on the ground of these appropriations, every one of which had a majority of the body in its favor.

I take that for granted. I do not, therefore, believe that the rejection of the bill was on account of these appropriations. I believe, even if they had something to do with the cause, which we cannot exactly inquire into, which led to the defeat of the bill, when we make these amendments, proper and appropriate, and germane to a deficiency bill, as I have endeavored to show them to be, and they go before the House, they will be treated with the respect to which they are entitled. If the House differ from us, of course they will reject our amendments; and then comes the question, and then will be time enough to discuss it, as to whether we shall assent to their rejection, or insist on the amendment. I submit, therefore, we hazard nothing to the appropriation bill by the insertion of these amendments, which are not only proper and appropriate, but are of the very character of a deficiency. The situation of the custom-houses require that they should be inserted.

Mr. GEYER. Objection is made to the appropriations proposed by the amendments for these custom-houses, on the ground that they are not proper to be inserted in a deficiency bill. Appropriations have heretofore been made for the construction of these buildings. It is desirable that they should be fire-proof. The present Secretary of the Treasury is desirous that the public edifices erected in his Department, and under his administration, shall be such as will be at least creditable to the Government, and secure to the archives that may be deposited in them. He desires to erect fire-proof buildings; but by the law, which is construed to exclude the conclusion of contracts extending beyond an appropriation, the contracts cannot be made until he can be satisfied that the amount of money necessary to the construction of the building will be appropriated.

Proposals have been made, I believe, for these custom-houses, to complete them for the sums which are proposed by the amendment to be appropriated, and to make them fire-proof. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends an appropriation to be made now, in order to complete the contracts, and that the work may proceed. There is, with respect to one of them now, an appropriation large enough to pay for all the work that can be done before an appropriation will be made, if Congress makes any this year, in the general appropriation bill. But it becomes necessary before the contracts can be made for the description of the work necessary for the buildings, that an appropriation should be made at an early day. Hence it is necessary that it should be made in the deficiency bill, or in a separate bill, in advance of the general appropriation bills.

It will be remembered that these buildings, the western custom-houses, as they are called, are appropriated to purposes other than that of a custom-house. In the city in which I reside, the public archives, transfers from the Spanish to the American Government, upon which titles to land depend, the records of the surveyors of them, the post office, now very large, are to be accommodated in this building. Sir, the whole amount proposed to be appropriated by the amendments, is nothing that can compare with the suffering that would ensue in consequence of the loss of the archives upon which the title to a large amount of land in my State depends. The appropriations which the Secretary of the Treasury recommends for that custom-house is extremely necessary. The season for making the contract for the construction of these works is now passing by. We do not know whether the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, of putting the appropriations into the general appropriation bill, will be available to us. Certainly it would postpone the buildings in the West one year, or the contracts must be concluded for constructing them very differently from the manner in which the Secretary of the Treasury desires to have them constructed—such a one as will render them a safe place for the deposit of the public archives.

There is, then, occasion for an early appropriation. You might as well have asked us to wait for other appropriations which are contained in this bill, as to ask that the contracts for the construction of these custom-houses should be postponed until the general appropriation bill comes up. The whole amount proposed to be appropriated for all these custom-houses exceeds very little the amount which was appropriated yesterday as a partial appropriation for the construction of water-works in this city, in which it is proposed to expend $2,300,000 to render the public property, which is not fire-proof, secure. That you voted for; but when a small appropriation to make public buildings in other places fire-proof in the first place, is asked for, we are told that we must wait until the general appropriation bill comes in. Mr. President, if we intend to erect these buildings in such a manner as not to have what is contained in them exposed to perpetual losses, now is the time to make the appropriation. If we wait until the general appropriation bill comes before us, the proper time for making the contracts will have passed. For myself, I should have preferred to wait for the bill for this purpose coming from the House of Representatives; but I perceive that the time is passing away most rapidly, and that the session is likely to be almost at an end before we can get the appropriation bill through. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. BAYARD. I will read from the communication made by the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, to show the necessity of making the appropriations. I will read it to show that contracts have been made for all or nearly all of these custom-houses, to be constructed according to the original design, and that they are made contingent on the action of Congress. I will read the statement as to the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama. The Secretary says:

"Bids were solicited for its erection by an advertisement of October 30, 1852, for sixty days; the lowest of which, for a stone exterior, exceeded the amount appropriated; and to effect its erection for that sum, the exterior of the building would have to be cut down to a brick and mastic covering, and some parts not made fire-proof, as in the St. Louis custom-house."

The Department considered that true economy required that a further appropriation of $65,000, to carry out the original design, should be made, and consequently made the estimate thereof, feeling assured that when the facts were brought to the attention of Congress its necessity would be seen, and the appropriation made."

Again, as to Louisville, Kentucky, there is a similar statement. So in regard to Cincinnati, Ohio. They all go to show that the contracts have been made contingently, and that they are in such mode as will not be carried out, unless a further appropriation is made to carry them out according to the original design. All these facts which I have mentioned are sustained by the communication which is numbered "Miscellaneous, No. 5," House of Representatives communications of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means in the House. It is necessary that these buildings should be fire-proof. The records which are preserved there are extremely valuable; and the Department judges wisely, in my opinion, in recommending that the necessary appropriations should be made to make them fire-proof.

Mr. BELL. I shall detain the Senate but a minute or two. I am not directly interested in the subject of these amendments; but I wish to make a remark or two on a principle which I think is not sound, and which should not be acted upon by the Senate, which has been advanced in opposition to the amendment.

Here are cases presented in which it is shown that the public interest will suffer if the works are not continued, and the appropriations made. The facts are not disputed, that the completion of them will be delayed for twelve months unless the appropriations are passed now—unless we avail ourselves of the opportunity presented by the deficiency bill, a bill of general interest, a bill so important that it may be necessary for the unembarrassed operation of the Government that it shall pass. This is just such a case as appears to me which this body, if a majority of them concur in the propriety and importance of constructing these works at all—and that is a question which is now passed, decided, if I understand it, for they have been undertaken—it is just such a case which either House of Congress may avail itself of the opportunity of bringing to a test again and again, if need be, for such an appropriation as this.

Some of these buildings are in a condition to be deteriorated. Not only is the question presented whether you will have buildings that are suitable for permanent public buildings, erected either in the East or the West, but whether you will follow up the appropriations which you have heretofore made, and prevent an actual loss, which will result by delaying the appropriation? I say, it is not a sound principle for our legislation in this body, to say that perchance the House of Representatives would not concur in it; I know it has been said that the House of Representatives have already rejected such appropriations as these; but it has been well replied, as I understood it, that these appropriations were connected with other and different objects, and that it is impossible to perceive upon what distinct ground connected with these appropriations the House could have acted; because the proposition was not in the House when they came to the final vote whether they would construct the custom-house at St. Louis, or Louisville, or Wilmington, for that question had already been decided; and I therefore take it for granted that there was some other motive which induced the action of the House. I have not read the debate in such a manner as to state what it is; but I take it for granted, in deference to the wisdom and the discretion of the House of Representatives, that there was some other motive which caused them to vote down the first deficiency bill, to strike out this proposition, or to reject the bill if it was not stricken out.

But, again, this bill does not necessarily fail if you agree to this proposition. The honorable Senator from Virginia knows very well the machinery by which this question may be settled and the bill not yet lost. This proposition will go down to the House, to be acted upon by them. I do not mean to go into the consideration of the question whether it is likely or not that the House would reject the bill because these appropriations should be made, if inserted by the Senate. I say it is an unsound principle to act upon; and I do not know but that it would be a much wiser and sounder policy, if a majority either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives are in favor of a public work or a public improvement of any description, or specific legislation upon any subject, to avail themselves of a bill in the nature of a deficiency bill—a bill the passage of which is necessary for the unembarrassed principles of the Government itself—in order to enforce by such considerations as they believed would be operative, a policy which they thought wise and just of the country.

Now, sir, I would make no such proposition. I would move no such amendment to the deficiency bill which is now before us as I am about to suggest; but I lay down this principle in regard to every public work which has been commenced, not only custom-houses, or mints, or post offices, or court-houses, but every other public work which has the sanction of both branches of Congress, if they had the opportunity to act upon them unembarrassed by rules, and those means of delay and defeat which it is always in the power of the minority in either House of Congress to adopt, I do not see but that it would be a much sounder principle of legislation, instead of relying upon that presented by the Senator from Virginia, for either House to avail itself of the deficiency bill to carry out whatever public works have been commenced under the sanction, not only of the majority of the two Houses of Congress, but of a large majority of the people of the United States; and to use this as a mode of enforcing their completion.

Sir, there are other public works which are just in the condition of these buildings, that have been in progress during the last year, and are unfinished. In consequence of the session being protracted to a late period in the fall, unless an appropriation is made now, not only will they stop, but there will be a large amount of loss of the expenditures which have heretofore been made for them. I allude to the extensive measures in preparation for clearing out the western rivers, or for the improvement of harbors on the lakes. A large amount of money has been invested in snag-boats and other machinery, which cannot be employed during the whole of this year; for, by the time we get a general appropriation bill through in September, or, as some gentlemen suggest, in October, there will be nothing done, and all that has been heretofore done by the machinery will be useless. The works will be half completed, and will consequently go to decay; or they will be destroyed by storms and freshets, because they are not completed. They will be damaged or injured, and they will have to pass through the same ordeal for another season, and be again exposed to storms, and freshets, and ice, before they can be completed. I say I threw out the suggestion that, unless some such plan is adopted, the system, which I believe has the support of the majority, both of the Senate and House of Representatives, and meets with the favor and concurrence of the country generally, will, on account of the protracted session of Congress every other year, have to be stopped. This will be the case unless some mode is devised or invented by which it can be kept regularly in progress from year to year. I do not propose to make any amendment to this bill to accomplish that object; but I say that the objection which is made to this amendment, that perchance the House of Representatives will delay the passage of the bill—they cannot defeat it, because the question will still be within the control of the Senate—is an unsound principle of legislation in either House of Congress; and instead of acquiescing in it, as suggested now, I should be in favor of the free and independent action of both branches of Congress to make an appropriation whenever there was a public work which demanded an early appropriation. I would not limit it to custom-houses or court-houses. I would limit it to subjects which were likely to suffer damage and injury by the delay. But I would do it on another account. If I supposed there were influences and principles in the administration of the Government—I do not say that there are now; I do not distinctly understand what their principles are which were attempting to thwart the operation of the system of improvements, I would, in that case, avail myself of a bill of this description for bringing them to the test of the sentiments and judgment, of the approval or disapproval of Congress, though it might embarrass the Government. Now, sir, I would have been perfectly willing that this bill should have gone along without any amendment at all. But other amendments have been made to it, which I consider less acceptable to me than this one. They have already been attached to the bill, therefore I feel myself perfectly at liberty to vote for this appropriation.

Mr. WELLER. I have a remark to make to my friend from Virginia; and before I make that remark, I desire to say something in regard to the custom-house at San Francisco.

As a matter of course, there cannot be any question as to the propriety of appropriations for the custom-houses. The only difference of opinion seems to be as to what place the appropriations should be made—whether in the deficiency bill, or in some other general appropriation bill. Yesterday, I did not vote for the amendment proposed by my friend from Maryland, to make an appropriation of $500,000 to bring water into this city, simply for the reason that I never desire to place myself in a false position. I was in favor of the appropriation, but I was opposed to putting it upon the deficiency bill; but my friend from Virginia, who has sought to exclude almost everything from this bill for fear of a difficulty in the House, voted for that amendment. Now, the only question is, whether these appropriations that are asked for are not in themselves proper? We have to act upon our responsibility, irrespective of what may be the action of the other branch of Congress. I say, therefore, that I shall vote to-day for the proposition which has been submitted by the Senator from Maine, as well as for that submitted by the Senator from Kentucky. I will vote for them, because I consider them necessary.

Look, if you please, at the custom-house at San Francisco. A bare statement of the facts there will show that our action is doing nothing to establish a reputation for economy. The Government is paying $133,000 per annum for rent. No one ever estimated the cost of a custom-house at over $500,000. The annual rent which you are now paying in San Francisco is twenty-three per cent. upon a half million of dollars. While you have a large surplus in your Treasury, and your Secretary of the Treasury is going into the market and buying up your own bonds, which only draw six per cent. per annum, and fall due sometime in 1860—while he is buying them up at a premium of eighteen or twenty, you are paying twenty-three per cent. per annum to citizens of California for the use of public buildings! Everybody knows in San Francisco that you cannot rent a fire-proof building for less than three per cent. per month on the cost. The owner, before he will rent the building, will make you pay three per cent. in advance upon what that building cost.

The Government of the United States now, while it is buying up its bonds, which only draws six per cent. interest, is paying to a few individuals in San Francisco three per cent. per month upon their money. The bare statement of that shows that, as a question of economy, and a question of economy alone, we ought to make the appropriation. The sooner you get rid of that the better. I ought not perhaps to complain. If the Government is disposed to pay three per cent. per month to the people of San Francisco for the money they have expended in brick buildings let it go on; but, as a public man, whose duty it is to look to the interest of the whole country, I have felt it my duty to make this statement, in order to just show the financial skill with which the legislative branch of this Government is now managing its public affairs. Your Secretary acts wisely in buying up the bonds even at the premium which he is compelled to pay, but I think that the legislative branch of the Government who have charge of the public money ought not to be willing to keep a large surplus in the Treasury and pay twenty-three per cent. per annum upon the public works in California.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to allude to one proposition which is disconnected with the amendment to the amendment. There is authority given there to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase buildings. I am opposed to that. There may be some reason for it, and it was to that I alluded, when I desired to consult with the Secretary of the Treasury. There may be some reason why that course should be adopted. The Government has already expended, in San Francisco, $90,000 for a lot. It has got all the materials there for the custom-house. After it got them, it was ascertained that probably the title was in the State government. That question is now pending. The controversy between the State and Federal Government, as to the title to that lot, is a matter for judicial decision. I have nothing to say upon that question. But you have all the materials there for the custom-house, and I prefer that you should make a direct appropriation, authorizing the purchase of a site, and then use the material which you own in its construction immediately. But if the Government thinks proper to pay twenty-three per cent. per annum to the people of California for a public building, they can go on. I shall make no objection. I have my own views in regard to the proper course which we should pursue in regard to that custom-house, but I shall not obtrude them upon the Senate now.

I am as anxious as my friend from Virginia that we should get through with the bill. So far as the action of the House of Representatives will be affected by putting this amendment on it, I have nothing to say; I have to act upon my own responsibility. I do not believe, however, that it would injure the bill half as much as the amendment which was made yesterday; I know that it was the custom-house question that probably contributed largely to defeat the first bill in the House of Representatives; but the defeat was brought about, not because of opposition to the appropriations; not because they do not regard the works as essential to the public interest, but because they considered that it was an improper place to make them. Therefore, the same objection would apply to the amendment which was made yesterday. I would not vote for that amendment then, because I thought that was not the proper place to make it. The Senate decided otherwise. That will embarrass this question quite as much in the House of Representatives as the appropriation for the works that nobody pretends are not absolutely indispensable.

Mr. HUNTER. I will ask the Senator from California if he will vote against this amendment, if the amendment for the introduction of the water into this city should be rejected?

Mr. WELLER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Whenever that question arises, I will give my friend from Virginia a very serious and proper answer. If that amendment is stricken out, I shall then be ready to vote in such a way as seems to me proper upon this.

Mr. HUNTER. My question has a practical bearing. I believe myself that the water appropriation was a proper one—a proper one in this bill. He does not. I do not believe that these appropriations are proper in this bill, because the sense of the House has been tested upon them. I certainly would give up one to get rid of the other; but if gentlemen mean to insist upon this, I shall be disposed to hold on to the water appropriation.

But what is there in this objection? This amendment is either right or wrong. Whether it is right or wrong does not depend upon the fact that the amendment in regard to the water appropriations was made. Those who think it was right ought to vote for it, whether the other amendment be in the bill or not; and those who think it wrong ought to vote against it, whether that amendment be there or not. My vote is not a question to be considered by others. That is a matter of my own. I vote according to my own conscience in relation to this matter; and it can be a reason neither for nor against the Senator from California in relation to his vote. But the purpose for which I rose was to get a vote, if possible, and to ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

On motion by Mr. FITZPATRICK,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HAVEN. If it is in order, I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CULLOM. I rise to a privileged question. The Hon. NATHANIEL G. TAYLOR, member elect to succeed the Hon. BROOKINGS CAMPBELL, deceased, from the State of Tennessee, is now here, and desires to be qualified.

Mr. TAYLOR then appeared and was qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States; which was administered to him by the Speaker.

Mr. EDMANDS. I ask permission of the House to make certain reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that they may be referred. I am about to leave the city, and I would be pleased to have the indulgence of the House to make these reports at this time, and have them referred.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. MACDONALD. I am desirous to make reports from the Naval Committee, and would be glad to have the same indulgence granted me, and I therefore object.

Mr. BENNETT. I rise to a motion of a privileged character. I desire to make a statement of a personal character; to do which, I hope to have the consent of the House. I propose to call the attention of the House, and of my colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR,] to the subject.

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) The gentleman from New York cannot proceed in his remarks, unless by the unanimous consent of the House. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from New York may proceed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York. It is, that if his explanation is likely to consume much time, it should be deferred for the present. There are gentlemen here who, I understand, really wish to discuss the bill that has been before the committee, on its merits; and it is right that they should have an opportunity of doing so now. This matter may be postponed for a time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York rise to a question of privilege, or to a privileged question?

Mr. BENNETT. I regard it so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his purpose, and the Chair will decide whether it is a privileged question or not.

Mr. BENNETT. I perceive by the Washington Union of Saturday last, an article published in that paper in reference to my colleague in this House, [Mr. TAYLOR,] who is said in that article to have declared his intention to vote in favor of the Nebraska bill.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) The gentleman is not in order. This is not a privileged question.

Several MEMBERS. Let him proceed.

Mr. BENNETT. An article appeared in the Washington Union on Saturday last, in relation to my colleague, in which it is stated that he had avowed his determination to vote for the Nebraska bill. I have received a large petition against this bill from the county of Tioga, where my colleague resides, (which was formerly in my district,) signed by, I think, over one thousand citizens, with a request to present it in the House. I should have presented this petition under the rule, knowing some gentlemen would object to it. But the petition was accompanied with a statement that it was designed as an instruction to my colleague to vote against the Nebraska bill; and that he had declared, in a public meeting, in that county, that he would vote against the Nebraska bill or resign, and signifying their request to have him do so.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker, all this is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will state very briefly the question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT. The point I make is this: It is evident my colleague is greatly misrepresented by his own people, in his own county at home, or by the Washington Union here; and I wish, if he desires, to give him an opportunity to explain.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

It was objected to.

The SPEAKER. Then the question recurs on the motion that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put; and the Chair announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. OLDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DEAN. I hope that the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn, that my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] may have an opportunity of replying to my other colleague, [Mr. BENNETT.]

The SPEAKER. The motion has been made here that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that proposition the yeas and nays have been demanded. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR,] as the Chair understands it, asks to make a personal explanation, which cannot be done unless by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. HAVEN. I dislike, Mr. Speaker, to mix myself up with this affair; but unless the privilege be accorded to the gentleman from New York, who first addressed the Chair, to make his statement fully, I shall object to the other gentleman from New York getting the floor to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] that it is not in the power of the Chair to grant the privilege he asks for his colleague. It must be by the unanimous consent of the House, if at all, that a personal explanation can be made. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from New York be permitted to make a personal explanation?

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. Let the gentleman over the way [Mr. BENNETT] be heard, and then I have no objection to his colleague being allowed to make an explanation.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. The gentleman was heard.

Mr. STEVENS. He was not. Objections were made to his proceeding.

Mr. BENNETT. I hope my colleague will be allowed to make his personal explanation.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I also withdraw my objection.

Mr. BENNETT. I hope my colleague will, by unanimous consent, be allowed to put himself right with his constituents, and will ask him if he has made any such declaration in a public meeting as I have stated, in any manner, and if so, what it was? And whether the article in the Union alluded to was published by authority from him? and if he gave authority to the statement that he should vote for that bill; and that nine tenths of the Democrats of Tioga county, who voted against General Cass in 1848, were in favor of the bill? I ask this with no unfriendly feeling towards my colleague, but only to give an opportunity to explain, and put this matter right.

Mr. TAYLOR. All that I desire to say in reference to this matter is simply this: that I have nothing to say here in regard to what I may have said, or what opinions I may have given on the Nebraska bill elsewhere. I do not know, nor do I believe that it is a proper subject for me to make any explanation upon.

In reference to the petition which my colleague has, it has been sent to him to present, and I am entirely willing that he should present it. If it had been sent to me to present, I should have done so with great pleasure, although it is opposed to my views upon that subject. But as those who had the control of it have chosen to send it to him, it can make no manner of difference whether he present it or I, and he has my full concurrence to do so, if it be his pleasure.

The question was then taken upon the motion submitted by Mr. HAVEN; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HAMILTON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill (No. 226) to authorize the construction of six steam frigates, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] had the floor, and he is now entitled to it.

Mr. KEITT alluded to the attitude of Messrs. Clay and Webster, four years ago, when it was announced that they had reunited and rewelded the links which bind together the Confederacy. How fallacious was the proclamation! Thirty years ago, Mr. Jefferson pronounced that the Missouri restriction fell on his ears like the tones of a fire-bell at night, awaking and filling him with terror. His prophetic eye flashed along the chain of momentous results, and closed with his voice of warning and foreboding. And sectional strife, bitter feuds and altercations, have been the offspring of the unnatural connection between principle and policy. The Missouri restriction has been the source of unnumbered woes. The majority has been trampling on the Constitution and the rights of the weaker section of the Union until resistance was fast becoming a law of self-preservation. But now a star of promise had risen in the West. As a southern man, if he were called on to vote against the bill, he should not, like others, arraign the gentleman who introduced it. Although he would stem the tide of fanaticism at the North, which was threatening to sweep down the Constitution, he would endeavor to arouse a stronger patriotism in that section, but he would mingle no charges of bad faith. There are brave men in the non-slaveholding States who are battling for the Constitution and for justice.

He then proceeded to disencumber the question of some constitutional embarrassments; and, in speaking of the ordinance of 1787, said it was an unconstitutional and a most graceless act; and, after defining what constitutes the federative Union and the powers under it, and the rights of the States, remarked that, just before Mr. Calhoun died, he received a letter from that distinguished statesman, in which he said: "I think these questions (at that time pending) can be settled by the extension of the Missouri line to the Pacific. I will not vote for it, but I will acquiesce." He would waive the right claimed by the South to save the Union.

He spoke of property in slaves as older than that in land, and contended that it was just as defensive on abstract principles. The Federal Government possesses no authority to create property, and only possesses the right to recognize it in a secondary sense; that is, sovereign States say what is property, and create the General Government their trustee; and its business is to recognize what the States say is property, and protect it; therefore Government should protect the property which southern men carry with them to the Territories; the latter not being the exclusive property of those who immigrate thither from the non-slaveholding States.

In conclusion, he defended the institution of slavery, and maintained the rights of the South. [See Appendix for this speech.]

Mr. BENTON expressed his views on the bill before the committee. It was granted, he said, that we should have a navy for defense and a navy for the protection of our commerce; but when we come to the question of a navy for conquest, or one that is to contest with the combined navies of the world for the supremacy of the seas, it was another question; one which was not indorsed by the earliest founders of our Government. We are (he said) a continent, not an island; our policy is peace, not aggression; it is defense, not conquest. This is our policy, and these were the doctrines of earlier times. A standing army was always condemned by the American people. A standing navy, a navy in time of peace, was always rejected by the American people.

He referred to that portion of the bill which authorizes these vessels to be built either by contract or in the Government navy-yards, and wished to know if our seven yards were not capable of performing this duty? What would they think of a man who possessed seven mills sending his tub of meal to his neighbor for the purpose of having it ground?

He thought that the policy of maintaining stationary squadrons was a mistaken one. It was a British policy. That nation had squadrons for home, and for the four quarters of the world. They had islands in all portions of the globe; but we had none, nor had we any inducement to follow their plan of stationary squadrons. He could see no adequate reason for our maintaining five stationary squadrons at points where he apprehended they had nothing to do.

Since 1812 $300,000,000 had been expended for navy purposes, and he assumed that we could not beneficially use this day the ships that we already had. Since 1812 we had had no use for a navy, and he could see but little prospect of needing one; for we had no system of aggression, of foreign conquest. We had our coasts to defend, and the outlets of our rivers to protect, but we had nothing whatever to do with conquest. The whole business of creating navies had been nothing in the world but a contest in ship building—a contest of ship carpenters. He argued at some length, and quoted the views of early statesmen against the policy of keeping up a navy for any other purpose than the protection of commerce, which at the present day needed but a small one. [See Appendix for this speech.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard with great pleasure the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri; but, as I do not quite concur with him, and as I expect to vote for this bill, unless my opinion be changed, I wish to make a suggestion or two in reference to the matter brought before us.

As to the instructions—which the distinguished gentleman has read—from Virginia of 1800, it was doubtless the opinion of the old Republican party. At that time it is known that the Republican party was in collision with the Federal party; and as the latter party was in power, I think that party feeling had as much to do with the subject of the increase of the Army and Navy, and the passage of those resolutions, as any sound statesmanship. Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, not many years elapsed before the same Republican party—coming into power—at the instance, I believe, of Mr. Clay, and other distinguished leaders, was obliged to take a different line of policy. Our present Navy, however, had its origin shortly after the war of 1812, and is not actually stronger now than it was thirty-five years ago. At that time we had a commerce of one million, or one million two hundred thousand tons. Our commerce is now four million tons. If the Navy, therefore, on its present basis thirty-five years ago, was not too strong to protect the commerce then, why it is too weak now.

There is one great difference, however, to which I wish to call the attention of the committee, between the things now and as they were in the time of the war of 1812. Then Great Britain was following the old plan of ship building, erecting sluggish hulks, while America adopted a better one, a system of building both ships of war and merchantmen, something like our present clipper ships; and the consequence was that one of our second class frigates, such as commodore Porter commanded, when at sea was easily able to keep out of the way of the sluggish British seventy-fours, and other large ships. In fact, I do not remember that but one of our vessels was run down through the whole of the war—I mean the President, under the command of Decatur; and that was done by a large squadron of the enemy. She happened to be surrounded, without sea room, and was captured. Our clipper vessels committed immense havoc on her commerce.

Since then there has been an entire change in naval armament; though a first rate sailer may, with a favorable gale, make as much progress as a steamer, yet in all sorts of weather it cannot be pretended she will be able to escape. The consequence is, that vessels having the benefit of sail and steam together will easily be able to run down any of our merchantmen and our sailing vessels. I take it if we were involved in a war with Great Britain at this time, our merchantmen would suffer greatly. We have not sufficient force to convoy them. They would easily be run down. One of the large paddle-wheel steamers would carry an armament sufficient to capture a merchantman. Such a vessel as one of George Law's, or the Collins line, would capture any sail vessel afloat—I mean a mere merchantman.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has arrived when, under the order of the House, debate closes.

Mr. BOCOCK (as chairman of the committee that reported the bill) took the floor to close the debate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will give me five minutes of his time to enable me to present a point or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. By general consent, the gentleman can allow me five minutes of his time.

Mr. BOCOCK. I will give the gentleman a portion of my time when I get through with my remarks.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall not want to take the floor then. I wish to throw out a practical suggestion or two just at this point.

Mr. LILLY. I ask if there are not still fifteen minutes before the debate must close? I understood the resolution of the House to be to close the debate in two hours after the House should go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the resolution provides that the debate shall close at two o'clock, and that hour has now arrived.

Mr. CLINGMAN. By general consent, I suppose I can go on for a few minutes.

Mr. BOCOCK. Does the gentleman confine his privilege to any particular time?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I should like about five minutes.

Mr. BOCOCK. I will yield to the gentleman for that time, if I can do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Virginia shall yield a portion of his time to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Rather than have to go through this formality, I will waive my request.

Mr. BOCOCK. I had not proposed, until the remarks that were made this morning by the distinguished member from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] to have said one word more to this committee in behalf of the bill under consideration. I had occasion the other day to go pretty extensively into the reasons on which the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I, as a member of that committee, based the propriety of this bill. I did not think, therefore, that it would have been necessary for me to reiterate any of the points that I then suggested; but much is due to any suggestions that come from so distinguished a source as the gentleman who has addressed us this morning.

The gentleman concluded by saying, that he had made his remarks without any expectation of influencing the vote of this House. Sir, the gentleman did not do himself justice. He does not know the respect that this House pays to his experience, to his talents, and to his public services. Any suggestions coming from him would, doubtless, have great weight here, and it is for this reason, and this only, that I think it necessary to make a reply this morning. In anything that I shall say on this occasion I beg that gentlemen to be assured I mean nothing but the most profound respect and courtesy to him.

The honorable gentleman commenced by regretting that it was one of the misfortunes of having been in public life a long time that the mind was continually reverting to the past, and bringing up the ideas of past years and comparing them with the ideas that are in progress at present. The honorable gentleman gave, in his own case, the very best illustration of his position, for he showed how a mind of gigantic proportions can be warped and led away by early preconceptions, and by notions that have been entertained long years ago.

Why, the honorable gentleman got up here this morning and discussed the action of the Navy Board upon our present policy. He has told us of the effect of the recommendations of the Navy Board at the other end of the avenue, when, by an act passed ten years ago, that Navy Board was abolished, and Mr. Jefferson's views in relation to it carried out.

Mr. BENTON. It went into bureaus.

Mr. BOCOCK. It went into bureaus, and there is now no Navy Board with power to make recommendations.

But, sir, in many of the remarks of the gentleman in the early part of his speech I entirely concur—especially in that part of them in reference to the impolicy of this Government keeping up so many navy-yards. But this bill has nothing in the world to do with navy-yards. I will inform the honorable gentleman that a resolution is now pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, to inquire into the propriety of abolishing some of those yards; and when the report of the committee on that subject comes up for consideration, it will be very proper to make any suggestions against the propriety of our having so large a number of them.

While upon this subject of navy-yards I would remark, that England has navy-yards at Portsmouth, Woolwich, Chatham, Spithead, and nine other places where the Government carry on works similar to those which we carry on in our yards. I do not suggest this here as an argument to show that we ought to compete with England in this respect. By no means. I do not stand here to advocate the idea, that the Government of the United States should undertake to equal England in her expenditure for her naval armament.

But we are referred to our former naval history and to the achievements of Commodore Decatur in the Mediterranean, and of Commodore Porter in the Pacific—and my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] met that idea very well in the few remarks he submitted before the hour expired for terminating the general debate upon this bill. But do not the members of this committee recollect the changes which have taken place since that time, in the preparations for sea-fighting? Talk now about sending gun-boats and privateers, to contend against frigates and screw propellers! It would be very much like the case of a person who, after seeing splendid mills built, with all the modern inventions, holding out inducements to all who had grists to grind, should go and set up his little tub-mill and ask customers to patronize him. To talk now about fighting at sea as we did years ago would be just as reasonable—with all respect I say it to the gentleman from Missouri—as to talk about sending one hundred men with breast-plates and helmets to contend against the Paixhan guns and artillery of the present day.

The honorable gentleman did not develop his policy at any great length. He informed us that he was against squadrons, and in favor of cruisers. I do not know how many cruisers the honorable gentleman would be in favor of. But I can tell him, if he wants cruisers, he ought to build the very vessels that this bill contemplates; for they are the vessels to make these cruisers. They are intended to carry a heavy armament, and to be so constructed that they can carry a good deal of provisions, and be propelled either by steam or by sails, as the exigencies of the case may require. France, Great Britain, and other countries, have their steamers sailing through every part of the great oceans of the world. We must be prepared to meet those vessels. We must have vessels of the same description. If we send out paddle-wheel steamers they would have to carry a large quantity of coal, as they are propelled by steam exclusively. But the vessels proposed to be built are screw propellers, which can be propelled by steam or by sail, as the circumstances of the case may require.

But we are told that our policy is not to have a force for offensive operation, but a naval armament intended merely to defend our commerce. That is exactly what I want—nothing more. But when gentlemen talk about the armament necessary to defend our commerce, why do they not tell us what amount of armament is necessary for that purpose? Why do they not look at the extent of our commerce?—of the dangers which beset that commerce?—of the foe we have to meet, and of the force necessary to meet that foe? Armaments to defend our commerce! Why, that is precisely what I want, and nothing more. Nobody in this country, I believe, has advocated a navy for the purpose of offensive operations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the policy of maintaining these squadrons, I ask what other policy can we adopt? We are told that we have here a home squadron; and the question is asked, "What do we want with a home squadron?" Why, Mr. Chairman, the cruising ground of the home squadron is from the fishing coasts of the North to the mouth of the Amazon. Ask the gentlemen who represent northern constituencies here what we want with a home squadron, and they will point you to the immense amount of money invested in the fisheries of the North for which they want protection. Ask gentlemen representing southern constituencies here what we want with a home squadron, and they will point you to the difficulties that we are continually getting into with the Cuban authorities, and others in the Caribbean Sea; and they will tell you that they want this Government to protect the rights of its citizens in these waters.

Then we are asked what we want with the squadron in the Mediterranean? The cruising ground of this squadron extends from the capes of Spain to the extreme of the Levant.

Sir, it is but a short time ago when a resolution was gravely submitted, and adopted by an almost unanimous vote of Congress—there was a very small vote given against it—returning thanks of the Congress of the United States to Commander Ingraham for having protected the rights of one of our citizens in the Mediterranean. He commanded a vessel belonging to our Mediterranean squadron; and, while the whole country was in a blaze of admiration for his heroic achievement, the Congress of the United States voting him its thanks. Yet, in the sight of all this, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Benton] rises in his place, and says, "What do you want with a Mediterranean squadron?" Sir, I reply, we want Ingrahams in the Mediterranean to protect the rights of our citizens there. We want men there to protect the commercial interests of our country. That is what we want.

We are told that we have a squadron in the Pacific; and so we have, and so we ought to have, in my humble judgment. We have our whale fishery vessels to protect; we have to protect the rights of our citizens there in every relation. We have our neutrality laws to enforce; and we have to guard against all the dangers that are besetting us in respect to the machinations of foreign Governments on the Sandwich Islands and other points in that ocean. And while all these things stare us in the face, we are gravely asked, "What do we want with our Pacific squadron?"

Why, sir, there are but two vessels in the Pacific squadron. The whole number of guns on both of these vessels do not amount to fifty. We had no vessel there to enforce our neutrality laws when Captain Walker marched down to Lower California and set up a Republic there against the rights of Mexico. I do not want an aggressive armament; but I want one to prevent aggression.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps if we could understand each other about the amount of naval preparation necessary to protect our commerce, there might be no dispute in regard to it. That is all we want—a force sufficient to protect our commerce and the rights of our citizens in every part of the globe.

If Mr. Jefferson had, at one time, been opposed to the Navy—though I do not believe he ever was—for the authority which the gentleman cited was against the "naval board; if he had been opposed to the Navy in the early period of his life, he saw enough in the course of his administration to convince him that that was a wrong policy; for he afterwards advocated a Navy.

Mr. Jefferson, in a message, July 10, 1807, in relation to gun boats, and their efficiency for harbor defense, closes with these words:

"It must be superfluous to observe that this species of naval armament is proposed merely for defensive operations; that it can have but little effect towards protecting our commerce in the open seas, even on our own coast."

On December 22, 1805, under a reference of the President's message, the Naval Committee proposed a vote of $660,000 to enable the President to cause to be built six line-of-battle ships.

On December 7, 1808, the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to the Naval Committee of the House, presented a statement of the additional number of officers and seamen which, in the opinion of the President, was then required, and which implied the additional annual expenditure of $2,662,949 51. Mr. Chairman, will gentlemen still quote Mr. Jefferson as opposed to a proper and reasonable Navy?

The main question appears to be now, whether the continuance of our commerce can be expected without more naval force to protect it, and whether such continuance is of sufficient value to the country to justify the requisite expenditure.

But I come again to the question, What is a sufficient Navy to protect our commerce? I answer, sir, it is a Navy sufficient to deter other nations from attacking it. In this case, more strongly, perhaps, than in any other, we see the wisdom of the old adage that "prevention is better than cure." By weakness you invite aggression from other nations, as in the period from 1800 to 1812, and you have afterwards to obtain satisfaction for such attacks by expensive negotiations, and perhaps by war, and the loss of immense amounts of money, property, and valuable lives. If we provide ourselves with a sufficient naval armament to command respect from other nations, we thereby prevent these aggressions, and save all this treasure to the country, and preserve the lives of valuable citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I stated the other day, when I made a speech upon this subject, what loss we are supposed to have sustained for the want of an appropriation of a few hundred thousand dollars previous to the war of 1812. That loss amounted to greatly over $100,000,000, and all for the reason that we did not make provision for building a few more vessels of war.

How came those aggressions to be made upon our commerce by France, the indemnity for which is now demanded of the Congress of the United States? It was because we did not have a force sufficient to protect the rights of our citizens. It was because by our weakness we invited aggression.

I do not know exactly how far the gentleman from Missouri disagrees with us, except that he will not vote for the bill. He stated that he was in favor of a sufficient Navy for the protection of our commerce, and he wanted a naval policy. So do I, but it would be well first for the gentleman to develop his views, give us his policy, say how many cruisers he wishes, of what description, with what armament, and with what force. Until he does that, I do not know how far he disagrees with us.

With these ships added, our Navy will not be greater than it has been heretofore. It is not proposed to make an increase of our naval force for the purpose of offensive operations, but simply and solely to prepare ourselves for the contingency in which we are placed, to act upon the defensive, and to guard the rights of our citizens and protect our commerce.

It is stated by somebody, I do not know who, that the Government is now paying $2,000 a day for a steamboat to keep reinforcements from going to the relief of Captain Walker. Now, sir, if we are obliged to pay $2,000 a day for a steamboat for this purpose, what is the reason? It is because you have an insufficient Navy. That is an additional reason why we should pass this bill.

Now, sir, as I stated in the outset, it was not my intention to address the committee upon this subject, except in reply to the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Missouri. I honestly believe that common prudence requires that we should build these vessels; and as no other argument has been advanced in opposition to it, I will take my seat without detaining the committee further.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. As the debate has been closed upon this bill, I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow me to occupy a portion of his time, if he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. STANTON. When I had the honor of occupying the position on the Naval Committee which the gentleman from Virginia, who has just taken his seat, now occupies, I repeatedly presented to this House propositions for the purpose of doing something very much like what it is proposed to be done in this bill. But, while I shall vote for this bill, believing that it is absolutely essential to the best interests of the country to do something to increase the efficiency of the Navy of the United States, I cannot help saying that I agree in almost everything that has been stated by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] I agree with him in everything he has said in relation to squadrons, and in relation to the arrangement of our naval forces for the protection of the interests of the country.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I understand the honorable member from Missouri to propose that we should have no squadrons at all, but that we should send out cruisers from our navy-yards whenever a particular service is to be performed. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee does not indorse that doctrine, for I confess I cannot see how it is to be enforced for the protection of the country, if each ship must wait for orders from Washington before it is detached upon any particular service. This I understand to be the policy of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. STANTON. I was just going to state, upon this point, that if he will look at a report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs two sessions ago, he will find that I proposed exactly what the gentleman from Virginia now proposes to do. I proposed that the naval forces of the United States should be separated into two divisions, one to operate upon the Pacific, and the other to operate upon the Atlantic. I endeavored, in a speech which I made upon that occasion, as the gentleman will see, if he will refer to the report in the Congressional Globe, to show the utter uselessness of our squadrons lying in port in idleness, in the different parts of the world, as they have done heretofore; though not so much lately as in former times.

My proposition was, in general terms, simply this: That we should have a number of cruisers, not fewer, perhaps, than the number of vessels now employed in our navy, but that they should be started regular or irregularly, as occasion might require, to cruise along the coast of the Atlantic and Pacific, visit the various consular ports in the different parts of the world, or those where we have diplomatic agents stationed, and then return, so that they would visit all the places where their presence are required at frequent intervals, and by which we should be able to concentrate, as occasion might require, a much larger force than we are able to do under our present system. It would be more economical. It would be better in every point of view.

But the idea which I was about to present here was, that I differed from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] only in this: I do not consider our present naval force too large. I do not consider that we require a greater number of vessels than we now possess, if they be of the right sort; and in all the propositions which I have ever had the honor to make before this committee for increasing the Navy, I have uniformly urged it on the ground of renovation, and not of increase; on the ground of substituting better vessels, vessels more conformable to modern science than those now in the possession of the Government. And it is for this purpose only that I am willing to vote for the six steamers provided by the bill presented by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKOCK.]

But it is said by that gentleman, and very truly, that the Government of the United States is now paying a very large amount to employ a steamboat for certain purposes in the Pacific ocean. Why is that? It is for the very reason, solely for the reason, that all our vessels—something like fifty—in commission, as the Navy Register shows, or a greater part of them, are now idle on their foreign stations. If the system I proposed, and which I have merely glanced at here, had been adopted, there would not have been any thirty days in the year, or perhaps any fifteen, in which a vessel of large force would not have made her appearance in the harbor of San Francisco; and been ready for any service which the Government might require; and the state of things which the gentleman now represents to exist at San Francisco would not have happened.

This is all I desire to say. I did not expect to say a word on the subject of this bill. I have been its friend from the moment it was introduced, and have voted for every proposition to bring it before the House, with the belief that it would go through without discussion.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not like to detain the committee, but I wish to ask the gentleman what squadron of vessels is needlessly employed at the present time?

Mr. STANTON. That in the Mediterranean.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I move to add the following to the end of the first section of the bill:

That three of the said steamships shall be put under contract by the Secretary of the Navy, giving both hulls and engines to one contractor; no contractor to build more than one ship and one engine.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that, as far as I can learn—and I have accurate information on the subject—the vessels at our navy-yards, and, although we have a great number of them, cost more than good vessels can be built for by private contract. Nay, I will go further, and say that, in some instances, the same character of ships have been well built by private contract for one half the amount we have to pay for their building at our navy-yards. This is an important matter. I know that it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. I should prefer that the committee would give specific instructions, by the adoption of the amendment which I have had the honor to propose, so that he may have three of the six steamships built by private contract; for I am satisfied that they can be constructed, and as well constructed, by private contract with ship-builders in New York, or elsewhere. I would rather see that done than that the whole of the vessels should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to be built at the navy-yards.

I know how strong the feeling is in some quarters to have these vessels built in Virginia, in Pennsylvania, or in New York; but I think the interests of the Government should not be allowed to suffer in this matter by considerations of that nature.

If these vessels are to be built in any reasonable given time, they can be built much more rapidly by private individuals than at the navy-yards of the Government.

I am very glad that the eminent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has expressed the sentiments which we have heard from him to-day, at this time, upon this floor. They are very suggestive and important, coming from such a source.

I was struck with the remarks made the day before yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LYON,] in relation to the Navy of our country. I am one of those who believe that we do not want a Navy as large as that of England or of France. I believe that if we could have such a Navy at once, and create a class of men such as is necessary to keep it up, by merely saying one word, it would be for the interest of the Government to reject such a Navy.

I believe that, as the gentleman from Missouri has well said, there is a strong tendency at this time to obtain a Navy for the purpose of aggressions. I desire to bear my testimony—feeble though it may be—against the spirit in which the declaration was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYON] the other day, that we wanted to make a descent upon Cuba, and in which the comparison was made between our naval weakness and the strength of England. I do not go for that doctrine. I believe that our vast commerce is our best protection; that our mighty ships whitening every sea, and our splendid vessels, (such as the Collins line going into Liverpool, and the lines going into Havre and other ports,) are just as much a protection, and an evidence of our power, as if they carried a hundred guns each.

I dissent from the opinion expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I believe that the more extensive our commerce, the greater protection it is to us. We are not now as we were in 1812. We are, and we are felt to be, a mighty Power, and every nation in the world would be cautious how they assailed us, for any consideration. It cannot be done in a moment. Nations do not precipitate war now. Look at the condition of Europe at this moment. How long have England and France refrained from striking a blow even at Russia, with whom they have comparatively little commercial intercourse? But let England or France be brought to face us, could she strike a blow without carrying it home? It would be striking at her own heart. We need not be alarmed. There is no danger of those great nations pouncing upon us as long as we are bound to them by the ties of a vast commercial intercourse.

No, sir; I tell you that if we are for obtaining a Navy, the object is to pounce on some weak Power and to extend our own area of territory, perhaps not for the wisest and best purposes either. But I will only allude to that. I fear it is the case; and, sir, when the sentiment uttered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYON] was received with applause in this House, I almost thought I must be in an assembly of filibusters, rather than in the Congress of the United States. Now, I am opposed to this feeling, and I trust the sense of the country is with me.

Mr. CUMMING. I am entirely opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island. I should much prefer, if we are to give the Secretary of the Navy any directions, to instruct him to have all these vessels built in the public dock-yards. I know from personal experience, and I believe every gentleman here who will take the trouble to inquire into the subject will agree with me, that vessels built by contract have dishonored, not only the Navy, but the country. I believe that the building of a military marine by contract has the effect of ruining it, and risking not only the honor of the country, but the lives of the men who are liable to be called upon to protect that honor. The best vessels that we have ever had in our Navy have been constructed in our dock-yards; and the most worthless vessels that we have ever had have been built by contract.

The latest batch of vessels added to the Navy—the Portsmouth, the Germantown, the Albany, the St. Mary's, and the rest of that class, all of which were launched from our dock-yards—are decidedly the finest ships upon the sea. Some of them have made passages scarcely surpassed, if paralleled, in the records of navigation.

The much and justly vaunted clipper ships, which have added so greatly to our maritime renown, and have commanded the admiration of the world, had their origin in the United States ship Portsmouth.

On the other hand, the frigate Hudson was built by contract, under circumstances which, if there be any honor in the human breast, should have impelled her constructors to have made her of the best materials and of the best workmanship. Sir, she was built by money extracted from the tears of the oppressed and suffering Greeks, and from the hearts of those who in this country sympathized with them in their struggle for liberty. After she was launched and equipped, she was purchased by the United States. She made but a single cruise. She returned in such condition that she was not even fit to be repaired; and we have again very lately seen a beautiful illustration of the contract system, in the batch of revenue cutters built for the Treasury Department.

A MEMBER. Was the Hudson built by contract?

Mr. CUMMING. Not by Government contract, but under contract with a private ship-yard. I think with all our pretensions to skill, which is undoubted, there should be no objections to following a good example. The British Government, taught by experience, have recently completed, at Keyham, next to Plymouth dock-yard, an establishment for the manufacture of steam machinery, and all the appliances necessary for the equipment of their steam fleets, at a cost of £7,000,000; and the French have a similar establishment on the Loire. These Governments had fully tried the contract system, and found it would not work; and that, although the work in the dock-yards appeared sometimes to progress slowly and expensively, yet in the end it was found that it was cheapest and most reliable.

The British Government not only build and equip their ships almost exclusively in their own yards, but I am of the impression that even their provisions are prepared in their own establishment; and I do know that in France there is no security even for the purity of that most essential article of ship stores, bread, unless the wheat is purchased by the Government, and ground and baked in their own dock-yards.

There are other matters connected with this important subject upon which I should like to enlarge, but my limited time will not permit.

It has become the fashion to decry our national ships. I can only say, after an actual service at sea of six years in these ships, that in various parts of the world, and on many occasions, I have seen their qualities tested; and I never saw one of them beaten. I have witnessed trials with single ships and with fleets; and in one trial, which I remember with pride and pleasure, I was on board an American frigate, built in our much-denounced dock-yards, which beat fairly, upon a challenge, a large fleet of the finest ships in the British Navy; and the gallant admiral in command, by "setting his top gallant sails," acknowledged the "defeat;" but, Mr. Chairman—

The question was then taken on Mr. DAVIS's amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title: Senate bill No. 298, being "An act for the relief of John Guzman, of Louisiana;" also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate resolution No. 1, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws; also, informing the House that the President of the United States had notified the Senate that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles, viz: Senate resolution No. 12, being a resolution accepting certain volumes and medals presented by her Britannic Majesty's Government to the United States; Senate bill No. 28, being an act for the relief of settlers on lands reserved for railroad purposes; Senate bill No. 39, being an act to extend the warehousing system, by establishing private bonded warehouses, and for other purposes; and Senate bill No. 151, being an act for the relief of George G. Bishop, and the legal representatives of John Arnold, deceased.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to amend the amendment, as follows: Insert after the word "frigates" the words "and two sloops-of-war."

Mr. Chairman, I deeply regretted, when I heard the remarks that fell from the lips of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] for I thought that if there were one thing which the public sentiment of the country seemed to concur in, it was that our naval force was utterly inadequate and inefficient for the purposes for which it is required. And, sir, I turned instinctively to that gentleman, whose character and influence entitled him to great weight and consideration on this floor, and expected that he would give proper direction and tone to the measure which is called for—as I conceive—by the public necessities. If I understood aright the tone and tenor of the gentleman's remarks, there can be but one view of his policy. It is a policy which would shut up our commerce within our own boundaries. If we are to confine our commerce to ourselves; if we are to have an internal, not an external commerce, then indeed the policy which the distinguished gentleman from Missouri recommends might be the proper one. But if we are to give encouragement to our external commerce; if we are to increase our relations with foreign Powers; if we are to increase our commerce with foreign nations, then, sir, on that great highway of nations—the ocean—must we have a power adequate to protect, and commensurate with that commerce.

But, sir, we hear everywhere the question mooted as to territorial balance of power. Sir, there is another balance of power to which our attention must be directed. It is the maritime balance of power. That power depends on the question of commerce. It is the struggle of commerce that is now going on among the nations of the world—that commerce which finds its pathway on the ocean. And it is there that the true question of the balance of power is to be fought and won.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that if we desire to increase our commercial relations; if we desire to see the power and commerce of this country progressing, we must increase extensively the power for its protection.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. DAVIS] says that his idea is, that as you increase your commerce and your merchant vessels, so you strengthen yourselves. Why, sir, it seems to me, that as you extend your commerce to foreign ports, you expose more points to attack. As you send your vessels further and further from home, into remote and still remoter seas, does that give you strength? Or is it not, in truth, an exposure at so many more distant points, requiring at the hands of the Government more and more protection, just in proportion to that extension?

Sir, it seems to me that the gentleman's peculiar apprehensions have colored his argument upon this question. He is fearful that these vessels may be wanted for Cuba. If our national honor is to be vindicated even in Cuba, does the gentleman say that we ought not to have a national power wherewith to vindicate our national honor?

Yes, sir, even in Cuba, where recent outrages were perpetrated upon our commerce, and where past outrages have also been perpetrated, which are yet unrequited and unatoned for, if they do call for an increase of national force for the protection of national interests and honor, I regret to hear the gentleman from Rhode Island say that he is opposed to the creation of means which are necessary for that protection and defense.

Let us pursue these things calmly and in a proper spirit. Let us compare our present Navy with our past Navy. Let us compare our present commerce with our past commerce. Let us compare our present line of sea-coast, confined originally to the shores of the Atlantic, with that afterwards added upon the Gulf of Mexico, and that finally acquired upon the Pacific coast. Compare, I say, your commerce of the two periods, and your lines of sea-coast, and then compare the present with the past efficiency of the Navy. I will ask you to compare it with the other nations of the earth. While our commercial marine, if I mistake not, is the first in point of tonnage, our naval force is the fifth, in comparison with other nations.

Mr. BOCOCK. I presume, Mr. Chairman, this will be a test vote in reference to the propriety of increasing the number of vessels to be built under the provisions of this bill. I shall vote against the increase, because I had rather pass this bill, authorizing the construction of six vessels, than to run the risk of attempting to get more. In other words, I would rather go for what I think we can get, than to go for what I think we ought to have, and run the risk of losing all.

A MEMBER. You need not lose all.

Mr. BOCOCK. The gentleman tells me we need not do it. It has not been many weeks since a bill was pending in this committee called the deficiency bill. I recollect a good many amendments were ingrafted upon it by the committee, and, among others, certain ones for the completion of custom-houses and marine hospitals. The bill was reported to the House, the House voted them all in, and then voted down the bill because they had been incorporated in it. Now, sir, there are gentlemen in this committee who would be disposed to vote for this amendment, because they really wished the number of vessels to be increased; but there are others, not friends to the bill, who also may vote for this increase in committee, and vote to put them in the House, for the purpose of rendering the whole thing obnoxious to those who would be disposed to provide for a less number, and thereby defeat the bill. I know the policy which is very often adopted to defeat a measure, and I do not mean to run any such risk in this instance.

I will make another statement to show that it is not necessary in this bill to make such an increase. This is a House bill. There is another bill, proposing to accomplish the same purpose, coming from the Senate, lower down on the Calendar. Now, should any emergency arise, in consequence of which the House might desire to provide for a larger number of vessels, they might take up the Senate bill and amend it, if they choose, by striking out "frigates" and inserting "sloops," or make any amendment they may deem necessary to provide for any exigency that may arise. But, in my humble judgment, it would be better not to increase the number provided for in this bill.

Mr. LYON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama by striking out "two" and inserting "six," so as to make twelve in all.

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the expressions I have heard from the gentleman from Virginia in regard to his vote upon the proposition to add a provision for two sloops-of-war, proposed by the gentleman from Alabama. I am surprised that expediency should have taken possession of the gentleman, instead of what he admits he believes to be best to promote the interests of the country. The gentleman admits that he believes the interests of the country require the increase of this number from six to twelve, and I am surprised that he should imagine that that would kill the bill. I can tell that gentleman there is more patriotism in this House than he imagines. I can tell him that there are men upon this floor who are willing to defend the rights of the people upon our sea-boards, and to defend the rights of our citizens in foreign lands. If the rights and interests of the country are at the heart, why not go for a just and proper increase, and not hesitate from considerations of expediency? Sir, expediency belongs to the scheming politicians who existed in the days of Noah, when he was building his ark. They laughed at him; they said it was too big—that the expense of building it was too great; but when the deluge came, it preserved him, while they were engulfed and destroyed. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, we have a deluge of revolutions. The whole earth is being revolutionized. You cannot point to a country, with a map of the world spread out before you, where great convulsions are not taking place. You see China; you see India; you see Persia; you see Russia; you see England; you see France; you see South America—and even in North America, here in this Hall, you see Nebraska threatening us with revolution as if Belona had been invoked.

Sir, let us be prepared. We have been asked, what are our vessels of war doing in the Mediterranean? I can tell you what one of them has done: It has sailed eleven thousand miles in nine months, and God knows you would not have it go any faster. I can tell you what another has done: It has protected the poor inhabitants of Salonica, who sought protection on board of it, for fear of being massacred by the Turks. I can tell you what another has done: It has protected the missionaries who were sent to preach the gospel at Beyroot and at Constantinople. I can tell you what another has done: It has been in the harbor of Naples, and patriots have been on board of it when they would have been hunted down as if they had been poor harts before the wolves of the forest of despotism. That is what they have been doing, a good, wholesome work, and one which the American people will vindicate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. In Smyrna, too.

Mr. LYON. Yes; one of them has been in Smyrna, too. The President himself stole the sunshine from South Carolina's son to gild his message. [Laughter.]

One word further. Let us have these twelve sloops of war. I will not say that gentlemen will vote for the amendment to kill the bill. I will not impugn their motives. I have too high respect for their intelligence and their honor; and I must say, that I am sorry to differ from my friend, the distinguished, venerable, and learned gentleman from Missouri, who stands in this House as one of the lofty columns of the Parthenon, the sole remaining one of a generation passed away. But, sir, we live in young America. [Laughter.] We live in a progressive age; and the same spirit alluded to by my friend from Virginia [Mr. Bock] yesterday—the spirit of manifest destiny—is in our brain; it is in our heart; it throbs in our nerves. We cannot get rid of it. I would as quick think of stopping—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LYON. I have just one word more.

[Cries of "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the gentleman shall be allowed to proceed?

Mr. McMULLIN. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that it was not my objection which caused my eloquent friend from New York to take his seat. I cordially sympathize in all that he has uttered in behalf of the Navy. I do not know that I have ever heard a more eloquent advocate of that relic of good old times. Sir, I am a friend of the Navy, though I am afraid, from the hint I have received from the chairman of the Naval Committee, that I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment which the gentleman from New York desires to see incorporated in the bill.

I go for ships in this case—ships of safety and of all kinds, from that old seventy-four which the gentleman has embalmed in his speech before the committee, down to the little sloop-of-war in which Moses got off. They were all good things all got up for good purposes, and all maintained for good and great ends. I am afraid, however, that if we attempt to hitch the whole fleet on, we shall be unable to get out of the channel at this time. I am free to say that there lies before me an amendment, which I was prepared to offer, anticipating the very one which the gentleman from New York has suggested; but I am driven from action on it by the fear that, putting on too much, we shall lose the whole.

I am persuaded that the Navy is not merely for glory, but that it is to be the safety of our nation; and I was sorry to hear the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Benton] quote the great patriarch of his party against the enlargement of the Navy, unless, at the same time, he should have said that the caution of that great and good man, now dead, would lose its force from the new circumstances in which this country is placed. If there was an error in Mr. Jefferson's administration; if there was one fault which crept into his mind, it was that regarding the Navy; and his friends and all America should have covered it from the observation of the world. Experience has shown us that we require a Navy; that our extended coast needs defense, and that all that we possess of military honor, all that we have of commercial enterprise, all that we boast of of commercial success, rests in a very great degree upon the establishment and maintenance of a Navy.

Sir, like the honorable gentleman from Missouri, my memory goes back thirty or forty years, and I shall never forget, that when the spirits of the country drooped under the defeats of our army upon our frontier, before our raw militia had been brought into full exercise and schooled into courage—I shall never forget the glorious uprising of the sun from the ocean when the Constitution spoke in tones of thunder to the British vessel, and in tones of gratulation to every American ear. From that moment the Navy of our country became baptized in the affections of the people; it lost all party character; it ceased to be the tool or the measure of this or of that party, and it became a great national engine—an institution to advance the glory of our country, and to protect and insure its prosperity.

Sir, I could vote cheerfully for an addition to this bill if I did not fear, from what has fallen from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that such an attempt might weaken the bill. I would, therefore, rather trust to the bill before us as it stands; and when I ascertain, as I undoubtedly shall by the vote on this bill, that there is a sentiment in the House favorable to a further enlargement of the Navy, I will most cheerfully vote to take up the Senate bill and provide by it for a still further increase.

Mr. DEAN. I ask for tellers on the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. Lyon.] It is a very important one, and I think it ought to be adopted.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. Lyon's amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. PHILLIPS's amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask for tellers on that amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That two of the vessels herein provided for shall be constructed on the Mississippi river.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. STANTON. I propose it as such, if it is appropriate. I do not know exactly what the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is.

Mr. PHILLIPS. My amendment is to add two sloops-of-war.

Mr. STANTON. Then I presume my amendment is as appropriate here as it would be anywhere else. I offer it, not with any expectation that it will be adopted by the committee, but in order to afford me an opportunity to say a word or two in reference to what has been said in the debate to-day about the navy-yards now owned by the Government of the United States. I presume it will be conceded on all hands, and especially by those gentlemen who favor an increase of the Navy, that some such establishments are necessary. So, when gentlemen tell us that one of these great establishments is necessary on the Atlantic coast, and that a large establishment is necessary on the Pacific coast, I have only to say that I think an important establishment of this kind necessary on the Mississippi river, for the purpose of bringing within the power of the Government, at its easy command, the vast and illimitable resources of the Mississippi river—its resources not only in material for the construction of our ships and our naval armament, but material in manning those ships.

I know that there has been a great prejudice excited against the establishment already existing on the Mississippi river. I have seen some hostility manifested against it in this House. I believe that as long as the Government of the United States maintains a navy—and I believe it is highly important that they should maintain a moderate navy—it will be equally important to make arrangements for taking advantage of the great resources of the Mississippi valley. It will be an evil day for the country, if it expects to defend itself upon the ocean in any important emergency, when that establishment shall be stricken down. There is one question that ought to be considered by the House before any of these propositions are adopted. I have no hostility to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Phillips,] provided it be proposed with the view of substituting better ships for the inferior ones now in the Navy.

In the prospect of war or difficulty, where any great service was to be performed by the Navy, I would vote for twenty ships, or one hundred, if it was deemed necessary; but I do not see any such necessity at the present time. If we renovate the Navy entirely—if we substitute for existing vessels those of a better character, we shall do all that is necessary for the present service of the country. Let us consider what will be required to keep up these vessels, if we add a dozen new steamers at the present time to our present force, and whether there is any emergency calling for any such increase. If gentlemen are looking to the acquisition of Cuba—if they are looking to a war with Spain or Great Britain—if that is the avowed purpose for making this addition to our Navy—if there is any real apprehension, danger, or difficulty from that quarter—I repeat, that I shall be willing to vote for this or any other increase—

Mr. FULLER. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Stanton.] I propose to make a remark or two very much to the same purpose as he did, merely to illustrate this idea. While this committee are being instructed and entertained, I have no doubt, by the remarks which have been made in relation to building up the materiel of our Navy, I desire to call attention in this connection—as I think, properly, too—to the personnel of the Navy. The valley of the Mississippi may be rich and productive in the materiel of the Navy; but where are we to go for the men that are to man it, is a very pertinent question, in my judgment. In response to that question, I will suggest an idea which I hope will be considered by the committee. You are to go into the rugged and boisterous high seas on our northeastern frontier, among the fishermen.

That is where the men learn the life of the sea. There are to be found the men who can man your ships-of-war, and carry your flag gallantly in the harbor of Smyrna, or in any other harbor on this habitable globe.

In this connection, sir, and while the Secretary of the Navy is exhausted and nonplussed, and while your ships of war are lying idle in the harbor of New York, you want strong arms and brave hearts to man these ships. I will say that it is on the northeastern coast that such men are to be found. And yet, sir, our Secretary of the Treasury—and I hate to refer to him, for he is my favorite officer in the Government—asks you to abolish your bounties on fishing vessels, which is the very school where the personnel of your Navy is made, trained, and educated. Now, sir, I do not know but that the rich valley of the Mississippi, with the hundreds of steamers on her river, produces brave and gallant men. I have no doubt but these steamers are manned by able men and skillful engineers. But, in my judgment, they are no more fit or suitable to man our Navy than our agriculturists would be. And, in this connection, sir, I say, that while I, for one, care not where these vessels are built, yet it is to be borne in mind that the proper relations between the materiel and the personnel of our Navy are to be guarded and provided for.

The question was taken on Mr. STANTON'S amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment—in the nature of a proviso—to the first section now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is alone in order. There is an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] on which tellers have been demanded.

Mr. GROW. Is an amendment to that amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; it is in order.

Mr. GROW. I move to strike out the word "two" in the amendment, and insert the word "one."

Mr. Chairman, on the 3d of December, 1847, this Government made a contract with the Collins steamship company, as it is called, for building four first-class steamers, to be used in time of war as ships of our Navy. We paid a large amount for the transportation of the mails, with the privilege of taking the vessels at cost, should we need them. The Government made another contract for the transportation of the mails between New York and New Orleans with Messrs. Sloo & Co., for furnishing five steamships under similar conditions. Then, in 1852, we increased the annual appropriation to the Collins line $236,500, making the amount of money now paid to that line of steamships $858,000 per year. This last appropriation was made on the condition that the Government should be at liberty to terminate the contract at any time after the 1st December, 1854, by giving six months' notice. Now, sir, I am opposed to voting any money out of the public Treasury for any increase of the Navy of the United States, until this notice to annul the contract with the Collins line of steamers has been given. Let us get rid of that contract as soon as possible. We can get rid of the last amount by giving six months' notice to terminate the arrangement, though we cannot get rid of the whole of the contract until the period for which their service was engaged terminates.

Mr. BOCOCK. What has all that to do with the bill under discussion?

Mr. GROW. I will tell you what it has to do with it. This was a plan of furnishing the country with war steamers in case of need. It was the sole reason urged by its advocates, and the only ground upon which the contract was made. It was the cheapest and best mode, as alleged by its friends, to build up a Navy to be used by the country in time of danger. And while we are appropriating annually this large sum of money by which it was intended to furnish the country with war vessels, why should we go on now and appropriate three millions of dollars for the building of steam frigates? If these mail ships are suitable for the purposes designed in the contract, then it is unnecessary; if not, the sooner we are relieved from those appropriations the better. We should first curtail this expenditure and cut it off before making any addition to it. Let our Navy be reorganized, so that when additional vessels are built, we can have an efficient corps of active men to man them—not men who have been waiting orders here for the last thirty years, and have not during that time seen service, and have now reached the years ill-fitted to brave the battle and the storm; let us have young and active men, imbued with all the ideas of the age, with ideas in keeping with a progressive republicanism and an advancing civilization.

Now, your squadron goes forth into the Mediterranean, and having nothing to do, loiters in its bays; and under the present discipline and regimen, your officers spend their time in dining with the satraps along its shores, drinking healths to their sovereigns, and lauding almost every nation on the earth save their own. If it is necessary that this vast number waiting orders should be quartered on the Government, then let us have a retired list, so as to open the avenues of honorable distinction to manhood, before old age has chilled its ambition and palsied its energies. Let service and promotion be thrown open to efficient men, like Captain Ingraham, the only man who has gone forth in the last quarter of a century and maintained the nationality of his country, and breathed into the decaying nationalities of the Mediterranean the true spirit of American laws and institutions.

Let us dispense in some way with these "old foggy" commanders who have remained on shore until they have lost all their knowledge of useful service, and are even frightened by the smell of sea-breezes. Let their places be supplied by efficient men; and when you have secured such, then build your vessels; for, till you do that, we have enough already. But before entering upon a new system of expenditures, let us dispense with the old; for our Navy now is the most expensive of any in the world, of its size.

First, then, let us get rid of the expenditures under the act of 1852, for furnishing the country with a Navy, by a copartnership with private companies. It is not only a wasteful expenditure of money by the Government, but a gross wrong to the citizen; and then let us get rid, as soon as possible, of all contracts like these. This Government has no business to come in, with its strong arm, to aid one class of citizens in competition with another in the same business, and especially in the carrying trade of nations, where it requires a large investment of capital, and long experience; a business to which men have devoted their lives, and in which is invested their all.

It is a kind of protection more odious than that given to the rolling mill and cotton factory, because more exclusive, and every man knows that that is odious enough. The Government has no right to extend its hand to interfere in the business relations of life. Let the citizen regulate his own business under the laws of trade, with no competition but that of superior skill and industry.

I have made these remarks, Mr. Chairman, in order to give briefly the reasons why I shall vote against the bill, and against any appropriation to build new ships until I see some way to put an end to these enormous expenditures, ostensibly for the purpose of furnishing war vessels, and until there is some reorganization of the Navy, adding to the efficiency of its personnel, by permitting the activity and the energies of manhood to take the place of decrepitude age.

Mr. BOCOCK. If I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he takes ground of opposition to this bill because the Government of the United States, some time ago, made certain contracts with Collins and others for the establishment of lines of mail steam-ships. Does the gentleman mean to say to this House that they are efficient ships for the Navy? Does he mean to tell the House that he voted for those contracts?

Mr. GROW. No, sir, not at all.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then he means to say that the contracts are good for nothing for the Navy; and because other Congresses have chosen to do wrong, he comes now and says we shall have no increase of the Navy until this wrong is righted. He would inflict upon the country an injury for the wrongs which, he says, former Congresses have done. Is that the policy of a statesman? Does the gentleman say that we do not need ships? By no means. On the contrary, he intimates that we do need ships. But because the Government has made contracts with Collins and others, utterly worthless to the Government, therefore, though the country needs protection for her commerce, and her citizens, nothing more should be done by this Congress until those contracts are disposed of and laid aside.

Sir, I never voted for the Collins line of steamers. A great many members of the House never voted for it; and, I dare say, it never could pass this House. But it is one thing to undo what has been done, and another thing to provide for present necessities. But suppose Congress will not undo what former Congresses have done; will you let the Navy rot down from year to year.

In reference to the other matter to which the gentleman alludes, I will state here that the Committee on Naval Affairs in this House, some weeks ago prepared a bill for the reorganization of the personnel of the Navy, and a more thorough one than any heretofore presented. I do not know that it is all right, but it will be before the House, and that gentleman and others will have an opportunity to discuss and amend it. But while we are about to introduce a bill to reform the personnel of the Navy, I ask the gentleman to tell me, in his fling at the officers of the Navy, when did an officer of the American Navy ever disgrace the flag of his country? Perhaps they drink too much wine. Many of them have waited too long on land, because they could not get ships to go to sea in.

But I want the gentleman to tell me, when you have called them into your service; when you have placed the honor of the country in their hands; when you have given them the flag of the country to uphold in time of war, or in time of danger, when did you ever know them to fail? Sir, it is a glorious fact in the history of the American Navy that there have been no traitors among them. In the other arm of your service it has been different; but a traitor in your Navy is entirely unknown.

I agree with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] that some reform is needed in reference to the naval officers and men. At a proper time I propose to bring up a measure in respect to the personnel of the Navy; but that is a distinct question entirely. The question is, do we want these ships? I think we do, and I think the House are of the same opinion. I hope, therefore, we shall take the vote as soon as possible.

The question was taken on Mr. GROW'S amendment to the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HENN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the committee refused to rise.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of Mr. PHILLIPS'S amendment, upon which tellers had been demanded.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move the following amendment, which I desire to have added to the section in the shape of a proviso:

Provided, That in the meantime, to enable the Secretary of the Navy to fit up for use vessels already built, and to obtain efficient seamen at whatever rate of wages he may find it necessary to pay, he is authorized to use such portion of the appropriation made in this bill as may be necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will adopt this amendment. If this bill passes, I understand the steamers we propose to have constructed will not be finished under one, and perhaps two years. In the mean time we have, I understand, some four or five vessels lying idle in our navy-yards, some of which in two or three days, and others in three or four weeks, could be made ready to do efficient service. The reason why they do not go to sea now is, I learn, because the Secretary of the Navy cannot obtain seamen to man them. He is authorized to pay only twelve dollars per month, while as high as thirty dollars or forty dollars a month are paid for efficient men in the merchant service. I am disposed, therefore, in case it should be necessary for him, at any time, to send out one of these ships, to authorize him to obtain efficient seamen at whatever rate he finds it necessary to pay. I am in favor of increasing the wages of the men employed in our naval service.

I voted in favor of a proposition of this sort at the last session. We pay the pages in the Hall some sixty dollars per month; and we increased it by a two-third vote at the last session to more than $120 per month. I think, therefore, if a proposition of that kind could pass the House by a two-third vote, we shall have no difficulty in getting the pay of these seamen raised from twelve dollars a month to twenty or thirty dollars.

Mr. PHILLIPS. To what amount does the gentleman understand sailors' wages are limited?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Twelve dollars.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The Secretary of the Navy has the right to pay eighteen dollars.

Mr. BOCOCK. Such is the fact.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then it would be in proportion as one to eight. I understand on the best authority that we have several ships now lying in port which cannot be got to sea for the want of men. It is very well known that the Japan squadron was detained for many months, at great loss to the service, because we could not get seamen. And though the Secretary is authorized to raise seven thousand men, yet he cannot get anything like that number, because of the low rate of wages.

I understand that first-rate seamen get thirty dollars and forty dollars per month in the merchant service. What I propose by this amendment, then, is simply that the Secretary of the Navy shall be allowed to pay such rates as he finds absolutely necessary to man the ships already built, and send them to sea. If he had had that power when the steamer San Francisco was understood to be lost, he might have been ready to send a ship out for her relief. It is utterly impossible, however, that this can be done at the present low rate of wages; and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to state the fact that this amendment will operate nothing, because, under the law now existing, the Secretary has the right to pay any amount of wages under eighteen dollars per month. He has been usually held down to ten dollars per month. He proposes now to pay twelve dollars per month; and he informs the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House that the only difficulty in his way is, that our friends of the Committee of Ways and Means hold the purse strings a little too tight on him. Unless we get their assistance, we can accomplish nothing.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I intend to move to increase the $3,000,000 to such an amount as may be necessary.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to the amendment; but do not propose to make a speech against it. I wish merely to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina whether the honor of this Government, or the interest of the people of the United States, requires at this time that a single ship should be sent to sea? If either require it, to what point should it be sent?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will answer the gentleman in a moment. It is very well known that we thought the interest of some of our people did require it a few weeks or months ago; and is my friend prepared to say that it will not be necessary in the next eighteen months or two years? I wish to make a provision in advance of the building of these steamers, which certainly will not be ready within a year.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. You will have to drum up an enemy to whip if you send vessels out. [Laughter.]

Mr. PECKHAM. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 65, noes 52.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being House bill (No. 52) "to authorize the construction of six first-class steam frigates, and for other purposes," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half-past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 31, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this being private bill day, I believe it is not in order for any of the committees to make reports; but I ask, as a personal favor to me, that the Committee on Naval Affairs be allowed to make a report on a private bill, in which a constituent of mine is deeply interested, simply that it may be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which the Senator from Florida refers, will be received. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GWIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Joyner, naval storekeeper at the Pensacola navy-yard, praying to be relieved from his accountability for sundry articles of clothing and small stores missing from the public stores, to report a bill for his relief.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I ask the general consent of the Senate to take up the deficiency bill to-day. I think we can dispose of it to-day if we will devote the day to it. I hope it will be the general pleasure of the Senate to take it up.

Mr. GWIN. If this is not objection day for private bills, I am in favor of the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDENT. Objection day, according to the rule, is the first and not the last Friday of the month.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to have the deficiency bill now taken up. Is there any objection?

Mr. BRODHEAD. I feel embarrassed about this matter. I am chairman of the Committee of Claims, and many gentlemen are coming to me every day asking for the consideration of private bills. If there is any great, pressing public necessity for considering the deficiency bill now, and if there is a general understanding that Fridays hereafter shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills, I will yield to what may be the general sense of the Senate on this question.

Mr. HUNTER. This is the first private bill day on which I have asked for the consideration of any bill from the Committee on Finance; and I believe I shall probably not ask another until towards the close of the session.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator's recollection is not very perfect. If I am not very much mistaken, I think there has been hardly any Friday on which the Senator from Virginia has not asked that private business should be postponed. Such is my recollection. Individually I have no objection to granting the request of the Senator from Virginia; but there is a private bill pending which has been discussed at length, and I do not know that it is the intention of anybody to discuss it further. I have no objection to allowing the bill referred to by the honorable Senator from Virginia to be taken up, with the understanding that whenever the Senate during the day shall be full we shall take a vote upon it. I refer to the bill for the relief of Hodges & Lansdale, and the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson and Ann E. Johnson, deceased. There is hardly a quorum present, or I would ask that the vote be taken on that bill now; but with the understanding that we can suspend the consideration of the deficiency bill at some period during the day, for the purpose of voting on that bill, I am willing to yield all the objection which I had.

Mr. HUNTER. I am in the power of the Senator from Maryland, and I have no right to make understandings for the Senate. I can only say that, so far as I am concerned, if the Senate will allow me to have the deficiency bill taken up, I will give my quota towards granting the general consent of the Senate for the purpose of taking up the other bill, if such be the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. PRATT. If that be the understanding, I am willing that the deficiency bill shall be taken up.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope, then, that the deficiency bill will be taken up.

Mr. PRATT. With the understanding that we can vote on the other.

The PRESIDENT. Then the Chair understands the Senator as objecting to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

Mr. FOOT. I desire to call for the consideration of a bill from the House, which is on the Private Calendar, granting a small pension to the widow of Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth. It is a House bill which came to this body, was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and received the unanimous approval of that committee. I will state further, that if there is any objection to it, and if it is likely to lead to discussion, I will consent that it shall be put aside, for I do not wish to interpose any debatable question in the way of the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Maryland, which has heretofore been pending on private bill days, and is now the first upon the Calendar. Presuming, however, that there will be no objection to this bill, I ask for its consideration now, as one of pressing importance.

Mr. GWIN. I did not hear a single objection to taking up the deficiency bill from any quarter.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understood, from the course pursued, that the Senator from Maryland—

Mr. GWIN. I am sure that the Senator from Vermont will not object to taking up the deficiency bill. This bill may be taken up at some subsequent period of the day.

Mr. FOOT. It will not take a minute now.

Mr. STUART. If we are to go on with the Private Calendar we had better commence in order.

Mr. HUNTER. The danger is that if we take up one private bill others will ask their bills considered. If the Senator from Vermont will give way now, I think he will find no difficulty in getting up his bill during the morning hour on Monday next.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the Senator does not understand that I object to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Maryland, whether he objected to proceeding to the consideration of the deficiency bill?

Mr. PRATT. I thought the understanding was, that the deficiency bill should be taken up, with the further general understanding upon the part of the Senate that when it shall become more full during the day we shall suspend that bill temporarily, merely for the purpose of taking a vote upon the private bill to which I have referred, and which has been debated in the Senate for the last two Fridays.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I understand there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair considers, then, that there is no objection to taking up the deficiency bill.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. HAMTIN, to amend the following amendment of Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That, for custom-houses, and to complete the same, the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated:

For the purpose of completing the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000.

To complete the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000.

To complete the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000.

To complete the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000.

To complete the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000.

To complete the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000.

To complete the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000.

For the purchase of a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000—by adding to it the following:

For the purchase of a new site for the custom house in San Francisco, $250,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his judgment the public interests will thereby be promoted, to apply this appropriation, and as much as may be necessary of former appropriations, for the erection of a custom-house on the land reserved for said purpose, to the purchase of a building or buildings, for a custom-house and other public offices; and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to take all legal proceedings which may be necessary or advisable to maintain and secure the possession and title of the United States to the lot heretofore selected for the site of a custom-house.

For the erection of a custom-house at Portland, Maine, including rooms for the United States courts, and for a post office, $200,000.

Mr. ADAMS. I have no disposition to protract this discussion, but I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate, for a moment or two, to what seems to me to be an error into which many Senators have fallen. Almost every gentleman who has spoken in favor of the amendments now pending, has agreed, at least, that it is bad policy to insert in the deficiency bill such appropriations as those proposed in the amendments offered, and which will be offered hereafter, in relation to custom-houses. Senators admit that it is bad policy to attach them to the deficiency bill, when the sense of the House has been ascertained, by their vote, to be opposed to them; but the excuse given is, that the chairman of the committee having control of this bill voted for an appropriation of $500,000 for the water-works here.

Now, sir, I submit that this Government does not belong to that Senator. He has no more interest and no more right in it than any other Senator here. I voted differently from him in regard to that proposition; but if he was wrong in that vote, every other proposition of the same kind (and it is said this is one of the same character) only adds so much more wrong; and adding wrong upon wrong never will make the bill right in the world. In other words, because the Senator from Virginia votes wrong it is no excuse why others should vote for any proposition for which they would not have voted, but for his favoring the one which has been referred to. The vote of one Senator is no excuse for another doing wrong.

But, sir, I have another objection to these amendments. My own opinion is, that we ought never, under any circumstances, when an appropriation is made for the fiscal year for any improvement, no matter what it may be, to make another appropriation at the instance of parties interested before the expiration of that year. The parties came here originally asking for such appropriations. They know very well, in many instances, that if they were to make a true estimate, and present to the consideration of Congress the full amount of the expense, they never would get a dollar appropriated; yet they make a very small estimate, which they know to be insufficient to answer the purposes, and the very moment they get an appropriation through Congress the amount is spent at once; and the cry is, as in this case, "Here are public works which will go to ruin, and the country will be injured, unless you make an additional appropriation."

You often make an appropriation, believed to be sufficient by Congress, to complete a work, and represented to be so, which turns out to be barely enough for a commencement. You appropriate $100,000 here for any work of internal improvement, with the idea that that is all which is to be appropriated; but at the next session of Congress you are asked for $500,000, and at the next for $1,000,000, and so it goes on. I say it is bad policy. You had better let your public works go to ruin than set the precedent of allowing Executive officers to spend a dollar more than is appropriated, or to make contracts, or commence buildings, or improvements, of whatever character they may be, in a different manner from what was intended by Congress.

Let these works remain until the regular appropriation bill. At the last session, Congress made such appropriations as, in its judgment, were right and proper for the fiscal year, and although it may appear in some instances, and possibly may turn out to be of advantage in a particular case to make another appropriation before the regular period, yet the precedent is a bad one. The agents of the Government are under the influence of the citizens of the different towns for which these appropriations are made, I take it for granted, in many instances. And all experience shows—I know nothing about these particular cases, and have no reference to them—but I say, that all legislative experience has shown, that if you make an appropriation, the agents of the Government, instead of conducting the improvements according to the amount appropriated, will make them to suit their own taste, and almost universally greatly exceed the amount intended by Congress. I would rather stop the works and suffer the necessary inconvenience following from that, than to encourage this course of legislation.

Mr. GWIN. With reference to the amendment now pending before the Senate I wish to make a few remarks, on a point upon which my colleague commented yesterday, and that is, in regard to the power asked by the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase buildings, as an alternative, if he cannot get a site for the custom-house at San Francisco. I have seen the Secretary of the Treasury, and ascertained from him that he asks for this authority for the purpose of preventing his being placed in the power of persons who may make combinations there to prevent him getting a site at all for a custom-house.

But he has no idea of resorting to the purchase of buildings there, unless it turns out to be indispensable for the public interests to do so. He has ascertained that it is very difficult to get a site large enough upon which to locate a custom-house building, because the ground belongs to various individuals, and he may be subjected to the same inconveniences as he is now in regard to the site, unless a power is conferred upon him to put him out of the reach of these combinations. He has no desire, and I presume nobody has, to purchase buildings there. We want a custom-house, and the Secretary of the Treasury asks that this power may be conferred on him in order that we may get one. That is all.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am not disposed to enter into an elaborate discussion of this question; but, before I vote upon the amendment which has been submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I desire to put myself right in reference to the vote which I shall give. I did not discover, when the amendment was first offered by the Senator, that it contained an appropriation for a custom-house in the State of Alabama. I was not aware that it proposed any such appropriation until I scrutinized it, while it was under discussion yesterday. I take a lively interest in the appropriation which is proposed for the custom-house at Mobile. It is one which both myself and my colleague are exceedingly anxious should obtain the sanction of Congress. But, sir, I have heard enough fall from Senators to satisfy me that the amendment now contemplated is out of place. On a proper occasion it will enlist all my energies to endeavor to get the sense of the body upon the propriety and justice of the appropriation, so far as that custom-house in Alabama is concerned. On a proper bill, and on a proper occasion, I should most strenuously labor to obtain that object; but if we are to heed the admonition of the Senator who has charge of this bill, [Mr. HUNTER,] enough has fallen from him to satisfy us that sufficient has already been ingrafted upon the bill to break it down.

It is perhaps not parliamentary to speak of what has occurred at the other end of the Capitol; but we cannot shut our eyes to the manner in which the first deficiency bill was loaded down and defeated in the House of Representatives. That was effected, to a great extent, by the identical amendment which is now proposed to be ingrafted upon it. In addition to the admonition given by the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has control of the bill, I have other guarantees and assurances that the amendment, if adopted by this body, will tend to jeopardize the bill. Every Senator must be aware that it will greatly embarrass the action of the other House when it goes there to be acted upon. All these questions have been considered there; they have all, as I understand, been discussed, and they have failed to receive the sanction of the House of Representatives. Should not then the Senate pause?

I am as anxious to have provision made for the construction of the custom-house at Mobile as any other gentleman is to have provision made for his State; but the Representative who has the matter especially in charge from that district, as I understand, is opposed to putting the amendment to this bill. He is opposed to it now, not because he does not want the appropriation made; not because he thinks that we shall not ultimately get the appropriation; but because he has a solemn and deliberate conviction that if the amendment be adopted to this bill it cannot receive the sanction of the House of Representatives. In addition to that, I understand that all the estimates made by the distinguished gentleman who is at the head of the Treasury Department are now embodied in a general appropriation bill, which will probably find its way into this body, in two or three weeks. Hence I deem it to be my duty to say, that in giving the vote that I shall give, I do not, by any means, intend to repudiate the appropriation which is intended to be made for the custom-house in the city of Mobile, but I do so from the deliberate conviction that the most effectual way to obtain the appropriation is not to prejudice it in the estimation of the Senate by attempting to place it in this bill; and to say further, that it was included in the amendment without my knowledge, privity, or consent, and I believe I may say the same for my colleague, [Mr. CLAY.] I know nothing of the merits of the amendment presented by the Senator from Maine. And I say, very frankly, that when I was not fully informed upon the subject, I was inclined to support the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky; for I took it for granted that all the appropriations contained in it were legitimate, and that they might, perhaps, with propriety be placed upon this bill; but since I have inquired into the matter, and learned the effect which it will have upon the bill, and that it may ultimately, to some extent, affect the appropriation, which is a proper one in itself, I deem it my duty to vote against it.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to suggest to the honorable Senator from Alabama that I think he misapprehends the facts of this case. Every one of the custom-house appropriations included in the amendment were separately sustained in the other branch of the Legislature, and the fact as to whether the bill was broken down on their account is a mere matter of conjecture. There were other amendments which were considered objectionable in the bill, and the bill was broken down as a whole. I have no remarks to make on the singularity of the proceeding. Every one of the amendments was adopted as a part of the deficiency bill by a decided vote, and I cannot see that there is any reason to suppose that the House will reject this bill because they are placed in it, allow me to say, according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. He evidently regards these as deficiencies. If they are not proper deficiencies I cannot understand the object and purpose of the bill. They relate to precedent appropriations. They are to continue works for which precedent appropriations have been made, and which, from an unforeseen increase of cost, it is impossible to go on with under the former appropriations. You must either suspend the works a year, for the whole building season, or make the appropriations now. The question of time is more material as to these appropriations than to any other appropriations in the bill. If that is not a sufficient ground for putting them in a deficiency bill, if the appropriations are proper in themselves, I am at a loss to see what is. This presents a singular fact. Here is a Democratic Administration, with a Democratic majority in the Senate, and a Democratic majority in the House, and the Secretary of the Treasury recommends these to you as deficiencies, and you propose to reject the recommendation without, as far as I have heard, a solitary objection being made as to the propriety of the appropriations themselves, or, indeed, without any reason being given why they should not go into the bill, except that it might hazard the bill in the other House.

As regards the Secretary of the Treasury, allow me to say that I differed from him certainly very widely in the course which he took in reference to the local disputes of New York. I regretted it. I thought it an error of judgment, and I was sorry that he involved the General Government in any such contest at all; but most certainly as regards a rigid adherence to law in the expenditures from the Treasury, as regards the strict care and disbursement of the Government funds, as regards an undoubted integrity and attention of the very highest character to all the duties of his office, I know no officer of the Government with whom he will not favorably compare; and I am not disposed, under these circumstances, to entirely throw aside his recommendation on a matter which he has had fully before him, which he has fully looked at, and for the appropriation to meet which being made in this deficiency bill he has given you the reasons.

Mr. HAMLIN's amendment was agreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment as amended.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Can the amendment now be amended?

The PRESIDENT. It is still open to amendment.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Then I move to amend it by adding the following:

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000.

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000.

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000.

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500.

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000.

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000.

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000.

At Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $15,000.

And to construct marine hospitals at Keokuk, Burlington, and Dubuque, $45,000.

Mr. HUNTER. Is that in order? Is it estimated for?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) Under the rule, to be in order it must be either in pursuance of estimate from a Department, or must be a report from a committee.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I will state that all the provisions contained in it, except those for Milwaukee, Keokuk, and Dubuque, are in exact accordance with the estimates. In those cases they have not been estimated for; but they have been recommended by the Committee on Commerce, which made a report at the last session, but the bills for which did not pass into a law. In regard to Milwaukee, it is one of the most important points which we can find on the lakes, and the appropriation is eminently proper in every point of view.

Mr. HUNTER. Those which are not estimated for specially, I presume cannot be offered as an amendment.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. If my friend takes advantage of that, and insists upon it, I withdraw those which have not been estimated for; and I will amend the amendment by striking out Milwaukee, Keokuk, and Dubuque. They have not been estimated for, but the residue have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not be in order for the Senator to move that as an amendment to his amendment, because the proposition which he has already offered is an amendment to an amendment. It is the privilege of the Senator, however, to withdraw his amendment and offer a new one embodying such a modified proposition.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I presume I can, by unanimous consent, modify my amendment. I modify it, therefore, by striking from it the items which I have mentioned. I will state that that amendment, as it now stands, is in accordance with the estimates of the Treasury Department. I will further state, that I consider the appropriations eminently proper; and it is a mere question of time as to when they shall be made. I was in favor, myself, of passing this bill through without any extraneous matters for my own or any other State. I was in favor of passing it without adding anything which did not meet with the entire approbation of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance; but since the appropriation has been made for the water-works in Washington, I cannot sit here and see the rights of my constituents totally neglected, when one of the most extravagant, in my opinion, wasteful, and outrageous appropriations which has ever been made, has been added to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read as modified.

It was read, as follows:

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000.

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000.

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000.

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500.

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000.

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000.

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000.

And to construct the marine hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator from Iowa votes for the amendment because he thinks the appropriations are proper, and properly in this bill, he is justified in doing it; but if he votes for it because, in his opinion, I have voted for an appropriation which he may think improper, I submit to him that that is not a sufficient ground for his vote.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I do not wish, by imputation, to charge my friend with any impropriety. His object was to get the deficiency bill through as soon as possible, without adding to it any extraneous amendments. I regretted to see him, as I thought, abandon that understanding, and agree to the insertion of the water amendment in this bill. We originally appropriated $100,000 for that object under the guise of introducing water into the city; and now we have just got it started, and, like all other such schemes, an additional $500,000 is called for to complete those water-works; and the appropriation will probably in the end run up to $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. The appropriation was made originally on the supposition that $100,000 would be the amount; but now an unforeseen appropriation is to be made. I do not blame the Senator for the vote which he has given. The amendment received his approbation, and he voted for it. He had a right to do so; and I do not wish to be considered as charging any impropriety upon him.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not know that the merits of the amendment, in regard to the introduction of water into this city, are strictly in order. If they are, I think I can readily show the Senator from Iowa that he is very much mistaken in many particulars. In the first place, if he will look into the debate which occurred at the time of the original appropriation, he will find that it was stated that, if, according to one of the estimates, the water should be brought from the Little Falls, it would cost between two and three millions of dollars. The President of the United States has approved of a plan which requires a larger aqueduct, and accordingly the Superintendent has made a larger estimate—between three and four millions of dollars. I believe myself that the work will probably be brought within the estimate, or near it. The Senator is of a different opinion. It is a matter of opinion. Neither do I believe, as it has been said, that that is an appropriation for the benefit of this city. It is an appropriation which is necessary at the seat of Government to make the place comfortable and habitable to the employees of the Government—the persons who carry it on. I believe it is done for the purposes of the Government, and for the interests of the whole people of the United States. But, sir, I repeat, that whether I was right or wrong, can furnish no justification for voting for another amendment which the Senator may think wrong, or out of place. Two wrongs cannot make a right. My vote can be no reason for or against a vote upon any other proposition; for this bill is not mine, as was well said by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ADAMS.] It is the bill of the Senate, and it is whatever the Senate choose to make it. No amendment can be put on it without a vote of the majority of the Senate. No amendment is there without such a vote; and it is the Senate who are to be held responsible as much as myself. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to take all the responsibility that attaches to my vote.

In regard to the policy of attaching this amendment to the deficiency bill, the Senate can judge as well as I can. They have seen what has been the effect of it in the House of Representatives. The opinion of the House in regard to this matter, at least, is known. In regard to the other, nobody can say what it is; nobody can say whether the amendment in relation to the water will jeopardize it or not in the House. I do not believe it will. I do believe that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky has once defeated the deficiency bill in the House; whether it would again do so or not I cannot say; that is a matter for the Senate to determine; and the majority will determine. If they believe that these are proper appropriations, and that this is a proper place for them, they will put them in.

lic buildings, that I believe appropriations for them have become so large and so general, that there requires to be digested some sort of system in relation to them. There ought to be some sort of system digested in order that the two Houses may have proper estimates and plans before they act upon them; in order to have some general rules by which to supply the wants of the community according to their wants, and not according to their demands, or the energies and abilities of the particular individuals whom we happen to represent. I think, therefore, that it would be better, in every point of view, to have them come up in a separate bill, hereafter, or in a general appropriation bill when there will be more time to digest a system; but, as I said before, that is a matter for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I regret very much to see this proposition, as an amendment to this bill, meet with the favor of the honorable Senator who offers it. Perhaps there has been an improper amendment made in regard to the introduction of water into this city; but, in my judgment, that does not furnish sufficient excuse for putting into this bill other amendments which may be also improper. I am remarkably anxious that the bill should be disposed of. There are other very important subjects which are behind it, and which are waiting to come up for the consideration of the Senate, in which I take a deep interest, and in which I know the Senator from Iowa is also very much interested. There is the Pacific railroad, the homestead bill, and other measures, about which many Senators are deeply solicitous; and what will be the result of our manner of proceeding with this bill?—that all these measures will be staved off to so late a period that when they do come up they will not meet with proper consideration. The Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, may have done right or wrong in regard to his vote for putting the $500,000 in this bill for the introduction of water into this city. I voted for it. I shall do so again. I think it is a proper appropriation. The Senator from Iowa thinks differently. I voted for the appropriation originally. When it was discussed in the beginning, it was understood that we were to go on and complete the work. Indeed, so far as I am concerned, I voted for the appropriation with that distinct understanding. I could not have justified myself on any other ground. I could not have justified myself for wasting $100,000 of the public treasure if I had not supposed that the matter was to be completed. I think, without making it antagonistic to other plans, that all sections of the Union ought at once to interest themselves in it. This is the seat of government. It has no commercial advantages. Its citizens have not the commercial advantages which the citizens of other places possess. It is the capital of the nation, in which we ought to take a pride. We bring people here to discharge the duties of the offices of the Government, and we ought to provide for their health and comfort; and we ought to have some pride in the national city of the United States. I am in favor of bringing water into the city; and while, because we have an overflowing Treasury, there are thousands of claims put up by which money may be taken from it, I am not willing to neglect an object which I regard as one of importance, and upon which I think we should legislate.

I am not on the Committee for the District of Columbia. If I had been, as a friend of the water appropriation, I should not have been in favor of offering it as an amendment to the deficiency bill. I should not have offered it, because I would have regarded it as much more safe and certain to wait, and attach it to one of the general appropriation bills; but the gentlemen who are on that committee, whose judgment is more to be relied upon than my own, introduced it, and I supported it. The same principle in regard to the offering of amendments shall still govern me. I feel interested in an appropriation which ought to be made, and which does affect, to a very large extent, the portion of the country from which I come, in reference to some Indians there. I am anxious to get that appropriation as early as possible; but, upon mature deliberation, I thought it best, as there would be very little probability of having the question determined upon its merits, under the state of feeling which now exists, not to offer it to this bill.

Then, sir, for the same reason, I object to the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Kentucky. I am friendly to the establishment of these marine hospitals. They are absolutely necessary. I am friendly to a matured plan with regard to our seamen who are employed on the steamboats in our western rivers; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact—my experience here places the matter before me so prominently that I cannot shut my eyes to it—that while you are asking for appropriations that shall be expended for the benefit of the seamen and hands upon those river boats, when made they are very frequently—(whether asked for for that purpose or not I do not know—I do not charge any one with it)—got in a manner which amounts to nothing but the expenditure of money in a particular locality. I think the system ought to undergo the severest scrutiny of the Committee on Commerce. It ought to be examined as to the points at which the appropriations should be expended. It is not a matter which ought to be placed upon the deficiency bill; and it evidently tends to create debate, and keeps back a vast number of other important measures. When it is evident that such matters will not be voted on upon their merits, under the state of feeling which has been generated, I think it would be better not to offer them. I shall vote against all these appropriations; not because I am unfriendly to the measure at all, for whenever the Committee on Commerce shall come forward with a well-digested plan to make appropriations, liberal appropriations, for marine hospitals, I will support them. But it is evident that if we pursue this plan, and give an appropriation for one marine hospital in this bill, another gentleman will have some other marine hospital, some other custom-house, to be appropriated for; and where are we then? And, sir, when are we to get the railroad and homestead bills before us if we go on in this way? For these reasons I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire only to say one word in relation to the amendment to the amendment, and that in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. The question of the marine hospitals has not been a matter of discussion before the Committee on Commerce at this session; but still I believe that every case embraced by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa has been investigated by that committee; and I do not hesitate, as a member of it, to say, that there is no appropriation in that amendment—I speak not with reference to its connection with this bill—that is not, in itself, just, proper, and appropriate. They are all recommended by the Department under whose supervision the whole marine subject is, and I do not think any of them is improper.

Mr. RUSK. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. The remarks made by the Senator from Texas would be excellent, and might be appreciated, if the bill had not been already amended. But, sir, it has been amended—amended in important particulars, and to the amount of thousands of dollars. One amendment to the amount of half a million of dollars has been put on it. That being the case, I submit to the Senator whether I can, in justice to my constituents, sit by and see appropriations of that sort made in this bill, while my section of country is entirely overlooked in reference to these matters, as it has been.

But, sir, in regard to this seat of Government; I have listened to all that has been said in regard to the improvements for it. We are now introducing water into it, and no one knows the amount of appropriations which are to be made for it. Would any man have said, at the time the seat of Government was about to be located at Washington, located here by a compromise of sectional and other interests, that the people of distant Iowa and of California were to be taxed to pay, not only for the necessary buildings, necessary as I grant you they are, to carry on the necessary operations of the Republic, of which they are proud, and of which every Senator must be proud, but, in addition to this, that they should be called upon to make extraordinary appropriations of money for other purposes, and for other works which are not so necessary? Sir, make St. Louis the center of this Republic, the seat of Government; give Cincinnati the seat of Government, and she will make her own water-works, she will pave her own streets, she will attend to her own municipal concerns, she will provide for her officers to attend to her police matters. But, sir, look at the appropriations which we are making for this city, and, for one, I wish to take my stand upon this matter. We are called upon to introduce water into the city for the purpose of protecting our public buildings from fire. We are asked to appropriate large sums of money to be expended in a reservoir to supply water to protect these buildings. Sir, we might build one out here somewhere for $50,000 or $100,000, which would supply the water for that purpose. Not only are we called upon to have the buildings made fire-proof, and to exercise a sufficient vigilance to protect them from fire, but we are called upon to make vast appropriations to protect them by water. I recommend, then, that a reservoir be built out here, and a fire-engine provided for these buildings to protect them. I am willing to vote to water all the library, and all the other portions of the Capitol as soon as it gets on fire, and so with each one of the public buildings, but I do not want to go into this magnificent scheme.

But the amendment has been put in the bill, and it has been done by the votes of gentlemen in whom I have the most entire confidence while I may doubt and distrust my own; but I maintain my opinions as honestly as do the Senators who entertain opposite views. The appropriation is in the bill. The appropriations which I now propose to add by way of amendment are necessary for the men who are engaged upon the rafts and steamboats upon our western rivers, whose bodies are being wasted under the malaria, and who, when attacked by sickness, ought to be conveyed to one of these hospitals, that they may be cared for and cured; and they are necessary to protect the western waters from the terrible ravages of the Asiatic cholera, which so often visits them during certain seasons of the year. No appropriation could commend itself more strongly to the judgment of this body. These appropriations are in strict accordance with the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I submit to my friend, that since the other amendment has gone on, the bill will gain strength in the other House by having these inserted. They must be made. The question is one simply of time as to when they shall be made; and though I would rather that the bill had passed through without having so many amendments attached to it, yet, as it has been amended in the manner which I have mentioned, I feel it to be my duty to submit this amendment, believing that it will strengthen the bill in its present shape.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I desire to add some remarks to those which I have already submitted, as to the propriety of amending this bill, and as to my course on the pending amendments. It is perhaps necessary for me to explain further the position which I occupy. If I understand it this is essentially a deficiency bill. The demands of the Government require that the act of Congress making the appropriation should be prompt, so as to enable the Government to carry on its operations. I desire to expedite the bill. I ascertained that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kentucky embraces an appropriation for the custom-house in the city of Mobile. That would commend the amendment to my favorable consideration. No member on this floor could be more active in favor of that work, because we believe the appropriation ought to be made, than myself and my colleague; but laboring under the impression as I do—for I am certainly impressed with the belief—that all these amendments hazard the bill, and perhaps will to some extent stop the operations of the Government, I announced my opposition to the amendment, as we all know it was these amendments which led to the defeat of the first bill in the House of Representatives. But with what understanding can I, or any Senator upon this floor, unless he has charged himself to investigate into the matter, vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa? My regard for that Senator, my implicit confidence in his good sense and uniform correctness upon particular questions involving constitutional law, and the expenditure of public money, commends any measure that he submits to the consideration of the body to my judgment; but can we in this hurried manner investigate all these estimates, to see whether they are legitimate estimates to be adopted by this body or not? It seems to me clearly not.

There are many estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and it seems to me that before we act upon them they should undergo the scrutiny of a committee of this body, and they should come before us in the legitimate form of a report from a committee. The appropriations now proposed have not been reported to us from a committee. I know that a committee in the other House reported upon the custom-house appropriations; but when they came here they should have been referred to proper committees, and should have undergone the scrutiny of those committees, and then they would not have failed to receive, I am sure, the favorable consideration of the great majority of the body.

The great pretext for supporting these amendments seems to be the vote of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. HUNTER,] for the appropriation of half a million of dollars for the introduction of water into the city of Washington. I very frankly say that I voted against that appropriation. I thought it improperly placed there. I said nothing against it, for I was content to give a quiet vote. I presume that if the Senator had foreseen the criticism which his vote has elicited he would have been willing to have dispensed with the appropriation. I think it was unfortunately put in the bill. Another matter was ingrafted yesterday, which was of no kindred character to the bill. Still I am not disposed to make that an excuse for introducing other matters into the bill which are not proper to be put there.

But the leading reason for the making of the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate a short time ago was to justify the vote I expected to give; and that was, because I thought we had better take the original bill as it came from the House. If, however, it is the deliberate judgment of the Senate that all these appropriations are to be ingrafted into the bill, I must go in common with them. I do not design to strike the appropriation for the custom-house in Mobile from that amendment. If the Senate load down the bill with amendments—and we appear to be doing so—and if we are to have the entire estimates sent by the Secretary of the Treasury ingrafted upon the bill, what is to be the result of it? The honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance says he cannot predict what it will be. He judges from what has occurred before; and I have been assured by gentlemen who can speak for the other House, that if we attach these amendments we shall endanger the entire bill. It is said that the general appropriation bill will sleep in the House of Representatives, and that the session will be almost at its close before we get it. If I thought that would be the fact I would risk the consequences, and give my vote in common with the other gentlemen who favor these amendments, although I do not think they are in the proper place. If it is the settled policy of the Senate to add the amendments, I am not disposed to make any discrimination, and take everything which is asked for except that for the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I am conscious that this is a legitimate appropriation. I am satisfied that I could convince the Senate that it is a proper and reasonable appropriation. It has been commended to the favorable consideration of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. Still, I should prefer to see it made in its proper place. Mobile is the third exporting city in the Union; and yet it is destitute of a custom-house, of a post-office, and of a room for the holding of the district court of the United States. Notwithstanding it is the third exporting city in the Union, if I am not incorrectly informed, we are subjected to all the difficulties to which that leads, and the Government is paying a high rent for its buildings. The third exporting city of the Union has not now a custom-house, or a post office, or a room in which the courts of the United States can be held! These things are so set forth by the Secretary of the Treasury. They appeal to the common sense and common judgment; so that, it seems to me, when the question comes fairly and legitimately before the Senate they cannot but agree to the appropriation. It is not with any distrust of the merits of the appropriation for that custom-house, but it is from a disinclination to embarrass the bill, and to prevent immediate action upon it, that I am prompted to the course which I have pursued.

Mr. BELL. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa whether the hospitals, the appropriations for which he proposes to add to the bill, have heretofore been commenced, and had an appropriation made at a prior session?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Every one of them, save one which has been recommended by the Department, and unanimously sanctioned by the Committee on Commerce, who reported a bill which passed this body at the last session of Congress. It requires but a small appropriation to complete them entirely.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated, in connection with my colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN,] the other day, that although we considered it essentially necessary to make an appropriation for the custom-house at Portland, Maine, we were not disposed to press it on this bill, and should not have moved it as an amendment had it not been for the amendment which was introduced by the Committee on Finance in reference to the custom-house at San Francisco. On the next morning that amendment was withdrawn. I suppose if any one of us had objected neither of them could have been withdrawn. We might have had a vote upon them, but we did not do it. Now, sir, I wish to state that I voted for the amendment which was proposed by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] in reference to the introduction of water into this city, not with a view to put anything into the bill that was improper, but because I believed, and I was induced more particularly to believe from the remarks made by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] in explanation, that it was a proper appropriation, and that I was merely doing my duty in voting for it. I should not have voted for it at all had I believed that it was in an improper place. I believed it to be peculiarly proper to go into a bill of this kind, and having that belief, seeing no impropriety in it, and being in favor of it, I saw no reason for withholding my vote from it.

I am at a loss to understand what this deficiency bill means. Senators say that these appropriations are all in the wrong place in connection with this bill. I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Finance explain to me what is a deficiency bill? Is it anything more or less than to appropriate money which is immediately needed for purposes which are pressing, and which cannot wait for the ordinary legislation? I should suppose so, sir, from the mixture of appropriations that I see in the bill. But Senators say that this amendment is all improper and out of place. If there is a distinction, I should like to know where it is. I find an appropriation to complete public buildings in New Mexico of $50,000. That is an original appropriation in the bill, and I should like to know why it is not as much out of place in this bill as an appropriation to complete the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri? I am unwilling, because I have a regard for order and the proper course of proceeding in a legislative body, unless it becomes absolutely necessary, to crowd anything into the bill that does not properly belong to it; but when I see here so many subjects of different kinds, and some of them not varying from the proposition made here, which has been exclaimed against by Senators, I cannot help apprehending that a matter is proper or not according as it suits the particular wishes of Senators in regard to it. If the appropriation for bringing water into the city of Washington, which I concede to be a good object, and for which I voted, was proper in itself, I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance why these appropriations to complete the custom-houses or marine hospitals are not just as proper on this bill? And if so, the vote of the Senator in reference to these matters certainly cannot be influenced by the consideration that this is a wrong place to make these appropriations.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not want to make another speech. I have stated the difference. It is this: We know that this amendment has defeated the bill once in the House; we do not know that the amendment in relation to the water would defeat it. So far as I can ascertain, I do not believe it would.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am speaking on another point. Some Senators say that it is an improper place to put these matters, owing to the peculiar character of the bill itself; that they are not appropriate to the bill before the Senate. Now, sir, I say that if the appropriation with regard to the water is a proper one to go into this bill, all these are just as proper.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not say that they are inappropriate on such a bill. They are subjects for a deficiency bill, if we choose to make appropriations for them. That was not my ground of objection. I stated that it was not in the proper place, because we know from what had happened that it would jeopardize the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is another point. But it has been stated by the Senators who have made objection to this amendment, that this is a bill which is only brought in for certain things, and it is because the money must be had. Then the only question for the Senate to decide is, whether it is a case of such pressing necessity as to make it an amendment which ought to go into this bill, and not wait for a chance to make the appropriation during the last days and nights of the session, amid all the difficulties which then surround us, of which I have had some little experience heretofore. Then, if these amendments are proper in themselves, why should we not put them in the bill? There is an objection made, on the part of certain Senators, who are willing to try the experiment with regard to putting other appropriations in the bill, that it may endanger the bill. Let me ask, if they are so anxious for the passage of the bill, and so very much afraid of endangering it, why they try these dangerous experiments in regard to it? Why try so dangerous an experiment as to put on it an appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars for a matter which they know is contested in both branches of Congress? It is contested here—contested very strongly. Unquestionably, it will be contested in the other House. It is not a matter which commends itself to the mind of every man as soon as it is stated to him. It is a matter which calls for debate, and it is just as likely to endanger a bill of this description as any other thing. It does not bring as much force to bear upon it and to support it as all these amendments which are appropriations for matters existing in different parts of the country, and which bring very considerable strength to bear upon them. I am apprehensive that gentlemen hardly argue fairly, when they are willing to put on this bill an amendment of that description, of so large an amount, a single item, and try the experiment upon it; for they certainly know that it will to some extent endanger it. Why do so, if the bill itself is of any pressing necessity? I do not agree with other Senators, who state that they are opposed to all bills of this description. I believe that they are necessary. I believe that they are indispensable. I do not think, in the mode in which legislation is transacted here, that we could get along reasonably well without one. Matters arise which are always of pressing necessity, and for which such appropriations should be made for the good of the country, and for carrying on the public works.

Then, I not only am not satisfied, that, as stated by gentlemen, the danger to the bill in the other House arises from these appropriations for custom-houses, but I go further, and agree most distinctly with the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that it is not a thing which should govern our judgment or our action in reference to the matter. We must act upon our own responsibilities. How are we to do in passing a bill, or in making a movement in reference to a bill which we judge to be of importance? Are we, in the first place, to inquire whether it would be satisfactory to the other branch of Congress? Or are they to make the same inquiry in regard to us? That would make us always dependent upon them in reference to these matters, or they on us. I suppose that legislation must be conducted according to the joint judgment exercised separately on the part of the two Houses of Congress, each House for itself; and if they disagree finally upon any matter, it is to be settled in the ordinary course of legislative negotiation; but I should be unwilling to establish or accede to the principle, either directly or indirectly, that we are not to pass an appropriation, or make an amendment to a bill, because we fear it will not be satisfactory to the other branch of Congress. We must ascertain that in the ordinary, due course of time. The bill, as has been stated, is in no danger itself. It must pass sooner or later; and we have as good a right, I apprehend, to take our own ground firmly in reference to that matter; and maintain it, and see what influence we can bring to bear on appropriations which we judge to be necessary, as they have in the other branch of Congress; but I feel that it is entirely unparalleled to adduce any argument of that description to the consideration of the bill here.

One word in reference to these matters. Every one of the appropriations now moved as an amendment has gone through the ordeal of examination, with the exception of those put on at the suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN.] There is nothing further to be done about them. Time is pressing. The country is quite as much in want of them as it is of one half of the appropriations which are made in the bill and called deficiencies. There is one here to appropriate money to the Patent Office for the purchase of seed. There is another relating to certain printing which is hereafter to be done, and which certainly was not a matter so pressing in point of time. All these things have been estimated for. They have been examined and thoroughly considered more than once. They are absolutely necessary at the present time. I hope, therefore, that Senators will adhere to the amendment; and, at any rate, that we shall test the question whether the Senate shall have a voice in settling matters of this description.

Mr. BROWN. I do not concur in the views expressed by various Senators, that we are to reject amendments to this bill on account of any apprehension that they will not meet with favor at the other end of the Capitol. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has very well expressed the idea that I entertain—that each House has to act upon its own responsibility, and separately, in reference to matters of this kind. Whatever I think is proper upon this bill, I shall vote to put upon it, without any sort of reference as to whether it is to please the other House of Congress or not. But there are two points about which I shall have to be satisfied before I can vote for this amendment; and the first is—I will address the inquiry to the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE,] who introduced the last amendment—as to whether any investigation has been made into the expenditures of the last appropriations? What has come of the money which has been appropriated heretofore? Has it been properly applied? Has it been accounted for? I want to be satisfied upon that point, not only in reference to the amendment itself, but in reference to the amendment to the amendment. These works have been going on for years. Appropriation after appropriation has been made for them; and, for one, I am not willing to sit here from year to year, and make appropriations of money upon bare estimates, without knowing what has become of the money which we have already appropriated.

Then I want to know as to another point: Are the appropriations now asked for to complete the buildings, or are they to go on to some time in the future, which is not defined, to do something, we know not what? Are we to be called upon to make another appropriation in a general appropriation bill?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. The amendment is "to complete."

Mr. BROWN. I know that term is put in the amendment; but that does not signify anything to us. It does not complete it, as we know from sad experience. You have made appropriation after appropriation "to complete" these very marine hospitals. Go back and look at your estimates for years, and you will find that they have been completed every year, according to those estimates, for the last five or six years. So with your custom-houses.

Another thing I would like to know. How much money is it going to take to complete these custom-houses in the West? How many hundred dollars is each one to cost? And is the value of the building, for commercial purposes, to bear any sort of relation, when it is completed, to the cost of it? I understand that you are asked to build a custom-house in Louisville, another in Cincinnati, and another in St. Louis, which is to cost the Government a half a million of dollars at least. So understanding it, I have from the beginning warred against it. You have no use for any such custom-house there. What is the whole importing business of the three cities? The annual receipts into the three custom-houses would not be sufficient to build one of them. There are to-day more than one hundred merchants in the three cities who transact more business than the United States do there. I mean that the receipts and disbursements of more than one hundred merchants in those cities are larger than the receipts of the custom-houses there, yet each one transacts his business, with all his merchandise about him, in a house that does not cost him perhaps exceeding $20,000 or $25,000.

Mr. CHASE. The Senator is mistaken in regard to the cost of these custom-houses. The total appropriation, including the appropriation of that custom-house in Cincinnati, falls short, I think, of $200,000. I am not certain as to the amount at Louisville. The St. Louis is the largest of the three. And in regard to the amount of business done at these cities, the Senator is under a mistake. I cannot state precisely at this moment, but the revenues collected there certainly very much exceed $200,000 a year.

Mr. BROWN. I have not referred myself to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I asked the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, yesterday, what were the annual receipts of the customs at Cincinnati and St. Louis? He told me, I think, that they were about $160,000 at St. Louis, and somewhere in the neighborhood of $200,000 at Cincinnati.

Mr. GEYER. I can state to the Senator that the receipts at St. Louis for the last year were $294,000. They are increasing annually at the rate of about $80,000 a year.

Mr. BROWN. Allowing the amount to be $294,000, why do you want a house which is to cost in the neighborhood of half a million, in order to transact that amount of business?

Mr. CHASE. The Senator will allow me to say, that these buildings for custom-houses are only called custom-houses, but they are also intended for the accommodation of the courts and the post offices, and the various public business of the United States, at each of these points, and really there is a great economy in the construction of a house for these purposes, instead of renting, as the Government ordinarily does.

Mr. WELLER. What does the Government pay in the way of rent now?

Mr. CHASE. Some $6,000 in Cincinnati alone.

Mr. BROWN. Well, sir, although these buildings are to be used for all these purposes, I think a smaller sum might suffice. But let that pass. I know very well that there is really no necessity for collecting customs at those cities at all. Who does not know that there is not one single ounce of merchandise which goes to one of those cities, which does not pass through New Orleans? and you are building a custom-house there which will cost from three to five millions of dollars. If there be a necessity for these buildings, and for the appropriation of half a million of dollars for them, let us appropriate the amount, but let us ascertain what has been done with the money heretofore appropriated, and how much will be wanted hereafter to complete these buildings. When the proper committee of the Senate have investigated these matters properly they will be able to answer officially, on their responsibility, whether these appropriations are needed; but when you merely bring in estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, and ask for appropriations without knowing anything as to what has been done with the money heretofore appropriated, and without knowing whether the present appropriation will complete the buildings, you are striking in the dark. I want information upon these points, and, without it, I cannot vote for these appropriations.

Mr. CASS. I desire not to be misunderstood by my vote. I will vote against these amendments; and yet, if I understand the object, I think I should vote for any one of the appropriations if it came in what I thought to be the right place. I rely very much upon the opinion of the honorable Senator at the head of the Committee on Finance in relation to appropriation bills. I do not want to hazard the bill. I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Maine, that this may not hazard the bill. If this were a matter of principle, I admit that we should not look so much as to whether it should be in this, or in some other bill; but when it is a mere question of expediency as to the best way of passing the provision, I think it right to look to the condition of things in the other House. That appears to me to be a legitimate subject of inquiry.

Mr. BELL. How will it cause the loss of the bill in the other House?

Mr. CASS. I am not responsible for the fact, Mr. President; but we have all heard what the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance has stated; and from his means of information I rely very much upon his opinion in regard to these subjects. I believe that this will hazard the bill. Sir, we have had these fights at every session on deficiency bills. The honorable Senator from Iowa has very well and properly said, that when what every Senator must feel to be a local question is crowded into a bill of this sort, those who do not bring forward their local questions of a similar nature are supposed to neglect the interests of their constituents. Some gentleman has referred to the Northwest, and the necessity of harbors and other improvements there. Now, I can say, that there is no place in the Northwest where the accommodation of commerce more indispensably requires the erection of a custom-house than Detroit; and I intend, myself, to introduce a resolution next week instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of erecting one at that point; but I do not want to introduce it here, and to encumber this bill with such an appropriation. I shall vote against the amendment on that ground, because I do not want to hazard the passage of the bill, as we have done session after session in this way; yet when the appropriations come up in the appropriate way to carry on existing works I shall vote for them.

Mr. GWIN. It has been so often stated that the amendments proposed to be put on the bill now will cause its defeat in the other House, that I think it is proper to correct that statement. Sir, there was another provision in the first deficiency bill which caused its defeat in the House, and that was the provision in regard to an assay office in New York. We know perfectly well that it was the vote of the Pennsylvania delegation which defeated the bill, and that it was not the question of the custom-houses. The delegation from that State in the other House almost unanimously voted against the bill, because of its containing an appropriation of over $500,000 for the New York assay office; and I undertake to say that had more influence in defeating the bill than the amendments now proposed.

Mr. NORRIS called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, to the amendment of Mr. Thompson, of Kentucky.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Brodhead, Chase, Clayton, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Everett, Fessenden, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Morton, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Weller—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Brown, Butler, Cass, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Mason, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Stuart, Williams, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

HODGES AND LANSDALE, AND JOHNSON.

Mr. PEARCE. As the Senate is now probably as full as it will be during the day, I ask, in pursuance of the informal understanding which we had early in the morning, that this bill may be laid aside temporarily, in order that we may take up the bill for the relief of Hodges & Lansdale, and of the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson and Ann E. Johnson, deceased. It has been already fully debated by my colleague, [Mr. PRATT,] and by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. GWIN. We are about coming to a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. Let us dispose of that, and then take up the bill of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the request of the Senator from Maryland will be acceded to. It is right and proper; and the bill can be disposed of without debate.

Mr. GWIN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Chair hears no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Maryland. The bill to which he refers is, therefore, now under consideration, as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill for the relief of Hodges & Lansdale, and of the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson and Ann E. Johnson, deceased, was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading; and they were ordered.

Mr. CASS. I hesitate to vote upon this question, because I was not here when the discussion upon the claim took place. I must therefore vote—from my previous impressions, which were favorable to the claim—for the bill.

Mr. JAMES. The same circumstances as those which the honorable Senator from Michigan has stated, will control my vote. I have not heard the discussion, but from reading the report I have received a favorable impression as to the justice of the claim.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Bell, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Chase, Clay, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Stuart, Wade, and Weller—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Bayard, Clayton, Evans, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Slidell, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Williams, and Wright—17.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was then read a third time, and passed.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate again resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. THOMPSON,] as amended on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Chase, Clayton, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Everett, Fessenden, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Morton, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Weller—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Slidell, Stuart, Williams, and Wright—16.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I move to amend the bill by adding, at the end of the clause providing for the expenses of the land commission in California, the following:

And the marshals of the northern and southern districts of California shall have the same mileage and compensation for serving processes issuing from said commission as are allowed to sheriffs for serving the same processes of the higher courts of California; and the same mileage and per diem shall be paid to witnesses as is allowed to witnesses by the State of California.

I will explain in a few words the necessity for this amendment. The appropriation to which I propose to add it is in these words:

"For salaries and incidental expenses of the commission, appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling land claims in California, $37,500."

The marshals of these two districts are required to summon witnesses before this commission. They have to travel great distances in doing so. They receive but ten cents per mile, while their traveling costs them fifty cents per mile. All I ask is, that when they are required to perform this duty they shall get the same compensation as is allowed sheriffs for similar duties by the highest courts of the State.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, the marshals in all the other districts are complaining. A colleague of mine was telling me this morning of a case in which a marshal of western Virginia was required to convey prisoners, and the cost of conveying them was more than his fees amounted to. The marshal of the eastern district of that State saw me the other evening, and he told me that the mileage allowed him by law is not as much as he is required to pay for traveling on the railroads to serve process. Why then relieve the marshals of one State and leave all the others out?

Mr. GWIN. It must be perfectly evident to the Senate that this is a special duty required of these marshals under a law which expires next March. The marshals are required to summon witnesses before the land commissioners, in addition to their duties before the United States courts. I know that the compensation of the marshals is too small, and I am in favor of having it increased upon a general appropriation bill. But here is an appropriation for a deficiency for the expenses of the board of land commissioners. Now I want the marshals who are required by law to serve the processes which issue from that board, and the witnesses who are required to attend its sittings, to receive the same compensation which is allowed for similar services by the State courts. I should not move the amendment if this were not a specific case, calling for immediate relief.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I have another amendment. It is to insert at the end of the appropriations for the War Department the following:

And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have the boundaries of the military reserve at the Presidio, near San Francisco, established to include only such an amount of land as is required for military purposes; and the residue of said reservation is hereby set apart for the use of public schools in the city of San Francisco.

That is according to the recommendation of the commander of the division of that coast.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there any estimate for this?

Mr. GWIN. It is not an appropriation.

Mr. HUNTER. It is an appropriation of land for San Francisco.

Mr. GWIN. I have a letter from the commanding general on the Pacific coast, giving, in detail, reasons showing why there is a great deal more land in the reservation than is required for the military service. Let the letter be read:

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS PACIFIC DIVISION,
SAN FRANCISCO, October 25, 1853.

SIR: Doctor Gwin, a few days before his recent departure from this city to resume his duties in the United States Senate, asked me whether I thought the whole of the reservation at the Presidio (near the Golden Gate) was required for public purposes connected with the defense of the harbor? I at once gave the opinion that there is much more ground included in the reservation than could be required, but that an opinion from the engineers charged with the duty of erecting the defenses for the harbor would doubtless be needed before any diminution of it could be recommended. By a note from Doctor Gwin, of the 15th instant, handed to me yesterday, I am requested to address my opinion on the point above indicated to the honorable Secretary of War, his object being to have the surplusage (if any) appropriated to the use of schools in this (San Francisco) city, during the approaching session of Congress.

I have no hesitation in saying, that, in my opinion, there is much more ground included in the reservation than is required for public purposes, and more than it is either expedient or, perhaps, possible to retain so near a rapidly growing city like this; and that if a considerable portion, to be designated under the direction of the President, could be devoted to educational purposes in this city, a better disposition of it could not possibly be made.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. HITCHCOCK.

Colonel 2d Inf. and Brevet Brig. General.
Colonel SAMUEL COOPER, Adjutant General,
United States Army, Washington City, D. C.

Mr. GWIN. The commander of the division states that there is much more land in this reserve than is needed for the use of the Government; and all I ask is, that the United States should relinquish their title to a portion of it for this purpose; because there are half a dozen titles to it now, and I do not know how many more may turn up before the question is finally settled. The commander of the Pacific division specifically states that he has now to keep a force constantly employed to keep persons from intruding upon it. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose that in other States the United States have more land than they can occupy for public purposes. It seems to me that it would at least be proper to add a proviso to this amendment, that the State of California should give up her title to this lot, upon which we have already spent $80,000 or $90,000 in reclaiming it from the sea and piling it.

Mr. STUART. I have a few words to say upon this amendment, because I have had occasion to call upon the Department in relation to a similar question heretofore. I think, and I submit it to the Senate, that it would be hazardous to interfere in this way with military reservations without having the sanction of the Secretary of War. It has not been done in any case, to my knowledge. A case arose in my own State in relation to Fort Gratiot, where six or eight hundred acres of land were held as a military reserve, and the Engineer Department to this day is unwilling to certify to Congress that there is too much land there for military purposes. That is not a place where the position is anything like as valuable, or as important to the public service, as this position at San Francisco. I submit that the Senate should not undertake here to-day to cut down the military reserve at San Francisco without consulting the Department, without having any information except a report from the officer in command, which is never considered as satisfactory. Besides, if that were to be done, I think it would be better to consider what disposition we should afterwards make of the land cut off. I should prefer very much, if we are to give it at all, that we should give it to the State of California at large, rather than to the city of San Francisco. There has not been a case of this sort before, to my knowledge, and I doubt whether one has ever arisen under this Government, where we have undertaken to interfere and dispose of a military reserve without the express sanction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. GWIN. The amendment requires his sanction. He is ordered to set apart as much as is wanted for the public interests, and the residue only is to be granted to the city.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MASON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1853, and for other purposes," as provides for compensation to the Spanish Consul and others, for losses occasioned by violence at New Orleans and at Key West, in the year 1851, shall be so construed as to place Michael Papperiza, a subject of Austria, on the same footing with subjects of Spain.

Mr. President, it has been made to appear to the Department of State that there was an unhappy subject of Austria, who was confounded with the Spanish subjects, at the time of the depredations upon them about the period of a certain public meeting which took place at New Orleans in 1851, in consequence of certain events in Cuba. The provision which was made to compensate them for those losses was confined by law to Spanish subjects. This poor man is the only one who is not provided for, because he does not come within the provisions of the law, as he is not a Spanish subject. His claim amounts only to $100 or $200, and there can be no doubt that he should be placed on a footing with the subjects of Spain in regard to this indemnity.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I report the following amendment from the Committee on Territories:

To Richard H. Weightman, for mileage and for per diem as Senator elect from New Mexico, $2,460.

I am authorized to offer this amendment by the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Territories. A Delegate from that Territory, who came here at the same time with Mr. Weightman, was paid, and how it happened that Mr. Weightman was not paid, I cannot understand. He was elected a Senator upon the presumption that New Mexico would be admitted into the Union as a State, and traveled from there to Washington city with that expectation. A Delegate came here at the same time. One was paid, but the other was not. I conceive that, according to the practice of the Senate, or of Congress in such cases, Mr. Weightman is equally entitled to be paid with other gentlemen who presented themselves under similar circumstances. Whatever error may have been committed by the people of New Mexico, and however delusive may have been the expectations under which he made his appearance here, Congress is not thereby discharged from the obligation of payment in this case, when it has paid all other Delegates similarly situated.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that this is a dangerous precedent to establish, to pay a Senator elect from a Territory when that Territory may not be formed into a State for a long time to come. If this is to be allowed, may not all the Territories be electing Senators and sending them here?

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is not a new principle at all. When Minnesota was left without any government, her people sent an agent here, and we established a government for them, and paid their agent. Oregon, being left without any government, sent two agents; we established a government, and paid them. Utah sent an agent in the same way, and we paid him. New Mexico, being left without any government at all, at the same time that California formed a State government, attempted to make one of her own, and sent her agents here. We have paid the Delegate whom she sent to the House, but we have not paid the gentleman whom she sent to this body. When we admitted California we paid her Senators and Representatives from the time they came here. We have paid every territorial agent except this one. This amendment is only to put him on an equality with the others. It was an oversight, or it would have been done before.

Mr. CASS. I feel very favorably disposed towards the amendment, if it is proper; but I wish to ask whether there was another agent from this Territory?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CASS. Then I will not vote for this. The New Mexican authorities ought to have known better than to send two here. They ought not to expect us to pay two Delegates for them. One has already been paid, and I am not willing to go further.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oregon sent two, and we paid them. New Mexico sent one to each House, and we paid the one sent to the other House, but not the one sent to the Senate. It was an omission at the time when we paid the one for the House. We paid two for Oregon.

Mr. CASS. Why pay two?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Only because two came on, and did service, and expended their means in coming.

Mr. CASS. Was there a contest?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir.

Mr. CASS. I think it is fair to pay one; but I am not willing to go beyond that. We did this at first for Minnesota; and we allowed the Delegate to take his seat, though not regularly elected; but are the people of a Territory to go further than that, and send a Senator here, without any kind of grounds for it? I am not willing to agree to it.

Mr. GWIN. I think the Senator from Illinois did not state the case fully. Two Senators were elected from New Mexico—one came, and one did not. The Delegate who was sent to the House was received there and paid.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Delegate was not received, I believe; but he was paid, after the formation of a territorial government. He performed service, and was paid.

Mr. GWIN. After the territorial government was organized, he took his seat, if I remember rightly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir; not at all. He went back for reelection.

Mr. GWIN. He was not reelected; and that Delegate never came, unless under his first election.

Mr. CASS. Mr. Sibley, of Minnesota, was one of the first cases.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Two came from Oregon; one was received, but both were paid. Two came from Utah; they were not received, but they were paid. Besides, at the time when New Mexico sent these agents here, the policy of the existing Administration was to encourage the people there to form a State government; and they had a right to suppose that they were to be received as California was. At any rate, this agent came here at his own expense, and expended this amount of money; but he was sent back. As you have paid all others, I do not see why he should not be put on an equality with them. He certainly incurred all the expenses. It was an oversight that it was not brought forward then. I had charge of the other appropriation, and it was brought into the Senate and adopted. This did not happen to be in my hands at the time, or I should have offered it.

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 11, noes 19—no quorum voting.

Mr. BADGER. I am very certain that this matter is not understood by the Senate, or they would not object to paying this gentleman. I know very well the reason why the payment was not made before. My friend from Tennessee remarked that it was some oversight. It was not an oversight; but when this very appropriation was moved to a former bill by one of the Senators from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] not now present, it was rejected in the Senate by one vote, and that vote was mine. I voted against it upon the ground that the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. Rusk] was indignant, (because, at that time the State of Texas claimed New Mexico as being part of her territory,) that an attempt should be made on the part of New Mexico to establish a constitution as a State, and send her representatives here. As my friend from Tennessee well remembers, we were then engaged in endeavoring to arrange the compromise measures of 1850, and we wished not to add any fuel to the flame of excitement and opposition which then existed in any quarter. But it was recognized, I believe, universally in the Senate as a just and proper allowance.

Under the circumstances, I should deeply regret that my vote given on that occasion, for that very reason, should be the means of preventing this sum being paid now. New Mexico undertook to form a State constitution; and, under that attempt, she elected a Senator to this body, and elected a member to the other House. The member sent to the other House was paid by that House. The person elected as a Senator to this House was not paid by this House. That is the whole matter. Now, I should be glad to see what possible ground there can be to make a difference in this case. It seems personal; it seems invidious. It cannot be the amount of money. I do not see why a different measure should be dealt out to this gentleman from what was dealt out to the gentleman who attempted, under precisely the same circumstances, to represent this supposed or assumed State in the other House of Congress.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee the propriety of altering the phraseology of his amendment, by striking out the words "Senator elect" and inserting "agent," or something of that sort. This gentleman might have been sent here as an agent, but he was not a Senator, and I cannot vote to pay him as a Senator.

Mr. BELL. He was just as much a Senator as was one of the honorable gentlemen who presented themselves here from California; but still I defer to the wishes of my friend from Maryland, and I am willing to let the modification which he suggests be made. I can see no possible difference between a proposition to pay this gentleman, and what has been done in three or four other cases. Certainly there is no difference in principle. There may be some prejudice existing with gentlemen on the ground that he is mentioned in the amendment as a "Senator elect;" but the truth is that he was not a Senator in fact, and therefore, I presume, with the consent of the Senate, that alteration can be made. Let him be stated as an agent sent by the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will suggest to my honorable friend from Tennessee that it will be entirely without precedent, for he will be the first agent whom we have paid as such. The others were Delegates.

Mr. BELL. Then call him a Delegate.

Mr. WELLER. A quasi Delegate.

Mr. BELL. I know it will be impossible to comply with the views of every Senator; but the substance is, will you reject the claim of this gentleman to be paid when he came here in a political capacity, according to the understanding of the people of New Mexico, to represent their interests in the Congress of the United States, or to present their claims to be recognized as a Territory or as a State, as Congress should think proper? They formed their State Constitution, and elected him as a Senator, but that did not make him a Senator. California formed her State constitution, and elected two Senators, but they were no more Senators than Mr. Weightman was, until Congress recognized California as a State of this Union. There is no difference in principle between the two cases.

Mr. BROWN. Were they paid?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Not until after the State was admitted.

Mr. BELL. I believe so.

Mr. BADGER. But they were paid for back time.

Mr. BELL. The payment reverted back by relation to the time of their arrival here under their election. On what principle did Congress pay the Delegates from Oregon, and Utah, and Minnesota? They came here not, technically and legally speaking, as Delegates, political representatives, recognized as such by the laws of the country; but Congress thought it was just to them, and to the inhabitants of the Territories who sent them here to present their claims and represent their interests, that they should be paid. Say, if you will, that it was done on the ground of liberality and generosity, and that we were under no obligation to do so; but, sir, I ask, when you have recognized the principle that you will pay under such circumstances, on what ground will you discriminate against Mr. Weightman?

Mr. BROWN. I should be very sorry if the gentleman who was elected and returned here as a Senator from New Mexico should imagine for a moment that in voting against this amendment I entertain any but the kindest possible feelings for him. I entertain very kind and friendly feelings for him. But where is this thing to stop? Are a mere handful of people somewhere in an unorganized territory, not a regular Territory, (for it is altogether inappropriate to speak of New Mexico at that period as a Territory; it was solely an unorganized country,) to be allowed to get together, go through some kind of farce of electing somebody here whom they call a Senator, and some one to the House of Representatives, to be called a member of Congress? And then are we to pay those persons, not because they had the least shadow of claim on earth to seats here or in the other end of the Capitol? Why, sir, I understand there are as many as two or three Delegates here now from the proposed Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. Are they to be paid? And are you to pay anybody who comes here from any portion of country, whether inhabited or not?

Wherever there is the shadow of authority, wherever there is the slightest pretext in law for anybody to come here, such is my respect for the purity of the ballot-box, that in all contests I am willing to pay both parties, lest such contests shall not be brought forward and fairly investigated; yet I think even that has been carried too far. I believe it is certainly going entirely too far to talk of paying two persons sent here by the legislative body of New Mexico. There was no legislative body there at that time, no constituency to send them, no State, or pretended State; but a mere handful of people get together and go through the ridiculous farce of sending two Senators to Congress, and we are to pay those whom they send. One of the gentlemen who was thus chosen to come to this body took a sensible view of it. He said, "I will not go to Washington. This is not a State, and there is nobody here to make a State."

I submit, sir, that this case does not at all compare with that of the State of California. There the people organized a government, and you admitted them as a State. Then, after you admitted the State, you paid the Senators their per diem. The payment may have related back to the act of election; but in the act of admitting the State, you made valid the previous action of the people. Here you repudiated their whole action. You did not even consider it. The action of the people in New Mexico was never considered at all in either House of Congress. The whole thing was looked upon as ridiculous. It is said that the member whom they sent to the other House was paid. If so, it was wrong; and one wrong cannot justify another.

Mr. BELL. How about Minnesota?

Mr. BROWN. In the case of Minnesota, according to my recollection, the Delegate was admitted. There was no law authorizing his election, but he was admitted to the floor of the House. But even allowing that there may have been a half a dozen precedents in that House, will they justify us? I say you are now setting in the Senate of the United States a new precedent. You are doing for yourselves an act which is to stand as a precedent through all after time. You cannot justify it by pointing to errors similar to it in the other House of Congress. I have a very high appreciation of Mr. Weightman. He was a Delegate in the House of Representatives when I was a member of that body. I like him very much; and if he could get this money quietly, without my having to say or do anything in regard to it, I should be very willing that he should have it; but I cannot vote for such a proposition as this, because I think it is wrong.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, we all know very well that the acquisitions made from Mexico by the treaty of peace with that Republic, led to very great irregularities in this Government. Sir, California, before she was either a Territory or a State, assembled a convention, under the counsels and recommendations of the Federal Executive, declared herself a State; elected members to a Legislature; and that Legislature elected Senators to this body; and the expenses of the election were paid out of the military chest, and that payment was sanctioned by the Government.

As has been well said by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, when the honorable gentleman who came here, claiming to be Senators for California, presented their credentials at your table, they were no more Senators than was the gentleman whose payment is now contended for—not one bit. I speak it without the slightest disrespect either to that State or to the gentlemen who represented her as Senators; but such was their actual condition under the law and the Constitution. Then what was done? California was, against my judgment, admitted as a State, and the gentlemen whom she sent here as Senators were not only paid their full allowance for daily wages, but their mileage also, dating back from the day of their arrival in Washington, and not from the time they took their seats. Everything, therefore, in that instance, was released.

Now, what was done in the Territory of New Mexico? Before that was either a Territory, organized as such, or a State, under the counsels of the same Executive, the people there attempted to erect themselves into a State, constituted a Legislature, elected two Senators, and a member to the House of Representatives, and sent them here. One came claiming to be a Senator; the gentleman who was elected as a Representative came also. How was it different from the California case? Both sprung up under the hot-bed of Executive recommendation. One was sanctioned, but the other was not. But does that fact involve, in the slightest degree, the principle of payment, or the expediency or justice of the payment? I cannot see it.

Sir, this Government was unsettled to its foundations by the actions of the late Administration connected with the acquisitions from Mexico. Yet it was all legalized; all sanctioned. Gentlemen came here representing, or claiming to represent, Utah and Oregon, in the same position, without any shadow of authority in law; yet the exigency of the case seems to have been admitted by Congress; and having been sent here in that capacity, their expenses were paid, as though they had been legally elected. Now, I understand the honorable Senator from Illinois says that one only who was elected as Senator from New Mexico came here; and the member who was elected to the House came here. That member was paid; and yet it is now said that we are not to pay this man because it will set a bad precedent. Sir, the precedent was set from the time the California Senators were treated as Senators nunc pro tunc. They were paid from the day of their arrival in this city. The precedent was set in the case of the Delegates from Utah and Oregon, before territorial governments were organized; and it is perfectly immaterial, in my conception, whether they were legalized or not as States or Territories. The principle is the same, and the justice is the same.

Mr. CLAYTON. Sir, the precedent was set, let me tell my friend from Virginia, long before the California case. The precedent was set as far back as the time when we began to admit new States. I do not wish to go back quite that far; I could mention a number of cases very readily, but I will content myself with referring to one with which I am somewhat familiar. I happened to be the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the years 1835 and 1836. The bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union was referred to the committee of which I was a member. We reported upon it. We rejected the application of Michigan for admission; we sent her back. Her two Senators, Mr. Norvell and Mr. Lyon, came here on the 7th December, 1835, when she first applied for admission. What followed? She was not admitted until the 26th January, 1837. She was not admitted until she had complied with the conditions which we demanded of her. She had to assemble a convention and change her constitution, to satisfy the views of the Congress of the United States, before she could obtain admission.

Now then the question is, what was done with the Senators? They came here on the 7th of December, 1835, and I have obtained a note from the Secretary's office, by which it appears that both Mr. Norvell and Lyon were paid from that day as Senators, although they could not have been Senators in any sense until the 26th of January, 1837. I think that has been the case always. I think it was so with Missouri.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1854.

NEW SERIES....No. 52.

Mr. GEYER. Yes, sir; it was.
Mr. CLAYTON. My friend from Missouri says it was. It has been the case with almost every new State which I remember. Now, why make a discrimination here? Did this gentleman come in good faith? Did he come under the belief that he ought to come; that it was his duty to the country to come? Is there any reason to doubt that? What was the condition of New Mexico when he presented himself here for a seat as a Senator of the United States? Why, sir, that Territory, like California, had been neglected for two years—shamefully neglected. No government whatever had been extended over either of those Territories, and each made an effort to rescue itself from anarchy. In the honest endeavor to rescue the people of the Territory in which he lived from that state of anarchy, this gentleman, I suppose, came here ready to submit to the will of the Congress of the United States. I have no doubt of the justice of paying him under these circumstances; and I respectfully submit that, to refuse to pay him, would be a departure from the precedents which we have heretofore set.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not go, sir, into the questions which have been adverted to, as to the propriety of the admission of California into the Confederacy of the States; but I will say this, that when California knocked at our door, she came here with some dignity; that is, she was represented to have a population which, if the steps for her organization had been legal, would have entitled her to be represented by two Senators on this floor. So of Michigan. I make a great deal of difference between a case where we reject one who is knocking at our door, and a case where we adopt as Senators those who have been sent here. We have chosen to adopt the honorable gentlemen from California who came here, as Senators and as associates. We did so upon the ground that the people of that Territory were in a state of anarchy, and formed a State constitution to put an end to it, having a population which had a right in some measure to assume upon themselves the position of a sovereign State. We adopted them, and made them Senators nunc pro tunc. I say "we," but I do not mean to include myself, for everybody here knows what my opinion was on the subject. But here, sir, is the case of a man who came from New Mexico to assume the position and claim the compensation of a Senator. I suppose he scarcely represented anybody but Indians; certainly not three hundred, and I doubt if fifty white people. We have not chosen to adopt him as a Senator.

Now, sir, the facility of making new States is great enough already; but to have this mode of throwing out a bounty for persons to represent themselves as Senators, when they cannot be Senators, and when they have not been adopted or recognized as such, is really throwing out a bounty for adventurers to endeavor to make States where they could not do so properly.

I shall vote against the amendment on every ground. There is no precedent which will bind me in its favor, and there is nothing in this case which entitles this man, in any point of view, to the character of a Senator or a Delegate. If he were a Delegate, it would be a different matter; for we know that a Territory may have a Delegate or an agent; but we know very well that any portion of the territory of the United States having not more than fifty white people, the rest being occupied by Indians, cannot assume, cannot even, by usurpation, take upon themselves the position of a sovereign State of this Confederacy. And is this man to assume to be a Senator from a mere blank Territory? I cannot vote for the proposition. I will vote against it on other grounds, because I think it is setting a bad example to encourage people to be intrusive, and claim to be Senators when they have no right to do so.

Mr. RUSK. If I stood perfectly indifferent on this subject, I do not know but that I should go with my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in opposition to the appropriation proposed by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] But, sir, the honorable Senator from North Carolina did me the honor to say that when it was brought forward immediately after the occurrence, it was defeated.

Mr. BADGER. I voted against it in deference to the Senator's feelings.

Mr. RUSK. At that time the question was presented in a very different aspect from that which it occupies at this time. Sir, I shall always regard the action of the Executive Government in reference to the transactions which led to this gentleman presenting himself as a Senator from New Mexico, as an outrage upon the rights of the State which I have the honor to represent. At the time he came here, having been invited to do so by the Executive Government, Texas owned the Territory from which he claimed to be a Representative. But, sir, that question has been settled; that Administration has gone out of power; we have composed the difficulty brought about by its interference. This gentleman, certainly, was not much to blame for acting upon a suggestion coming from the Executive Government of this country. Under these circumstances, and inasmuch as my friend from North Carolina thinks I defeated the proposition to pay him before, I shall now vote to put Mr. Weightman on a footing with other agents who have come here from Territories.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President, I remember the night when this claim was first brought up at the compromise session of 1850. I was never more strongly impressed with the belief that any individual was entitled to mileage and per diem as a Delegate than I was as to the justice of the claim of Mr. Weightman. I think the amendment was then offered by a Senator from Georgia, not now in his place, [Mr. DAWSON.] So just was the proposition regarded at that time, in view of what had occurred, that it would have passed, but for the boundary difficulty, of which my friend from Texas [Mr. RUSK] was the Napoleon in the Senate, and which he watched with an eye that never tired. He feared lest the recognition of this Delegate would, in some way or other, impair the right of Texas to all the land on the Rio Grande, which she claimed. He and his colleague—but he more especially—mounted it rough shod. It would then have passed, and passed triumphantly, but for my friend from Texas, and others sympathizing with him in that matter. Now, however, he proves himself to be a just and fair man, because when an opportunity is presented for him to do an act of justice, which has been long delayed, he is willing to do it.

It will be remembered that a constitution was presented here from New Mexico, and a Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD], not now in his place, made a speech for the admission of that Territory as a State; and it was highly probable, from the existing state and condition of things in the country at that time, that we were to have a serious difficulty in regard to its admission as a State with its sparse population. That difficulty, however, passed over when the compromise measures of 1850 were passed. The individual whose claim is now before the Senate was elected as a Senator by the so-called Legislature of New Mexico, just as General Harrison was elected Delegate from Ohio at first by its Legislature. That was the authority by which they were elected in former times. Who could doubt but that a province as large as New Mexico was, would be entitled to some representation in Congress? The Delegate whom she sent to the other House, although not admitted to a seat, was paid by a clause subsequently inserted in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The people of the Territory, believing that they were acting in accordance with the wishes of the Executive, in good faith sent this gentleman here as a Senator. He came expecting his seat; and I am sure he rendered good service to the people of the Territory. Since that he was elected to represent them in the other House; and he served there for one Congress. He is a political opponent of mine; but he is now at home; being no longer in public life. I always regarded this as a just claim, and I am glad to have an opportunity to vote for it.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the propriety of the amendment before the Senate, but there were some remarks which were made by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Virginia, in regard to Executive interference in the formation of State governments in California and New Mexico, which I think it is proper should be noticed by me. I do not know anything as to what the Executive did in New Mexico, but I should like to know upon what authority the Senator from Virginia says the people of California formed their government at Executive dictation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir, I should like to hear that.

Mr. MASON. I did not say that they formed their government from Executive dictation, but I said that the military commander in California at that time (whether by authority from Washington or not I am not aware) issued a proclamation, appointing the places of election, and inviting the people to assemble there to elect delegates to a convention; and he paid the expenses of that convention with Federal money. That is my recollection of the history of the case. If I am wrong Senators can correct me.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will my friend from California permit me to answer that statement?

Mr. GWIN. I will give the gentleman the facts, and then he may reply.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am perfectly acquainted with the facts.

Mr. GWIN. I yield the floor to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator from Virginia has said that New Mexico and California came here as States under the hot-bed of Executive dictation. Sir, the whole history of that matter has been entirely misrepresented. The same story has been told over and over again upon the floor of the Senate until gentlemen have got to believe it. It is not so. The commanding officer in California; the honorable Senator says, exerted himself to get up a State government there. Does the Senator pretend that was upon the dictation or recommendation of the Executive? Not a word of it, sir. When the people of California started in this business of getting up a State government for themselves, they did it of their own dictation. All that the President of the United States said to them was, "If you choose to take that course, as I can by no recommendation of mine obtain any kind of protection for you, as I can obtain no government for you, as you are in a state of anarchy, you shall not be resisted by me." An agent was sent out by the President for the purpose merely of assuring the people of California of the paternal regard of this Government; and Mr. King, of Georgia, was selected, because he was a member of the other House, acquainted with all the circumstances which prevented justice being done to California at the previous session of Congress; but, before his arrival, the people had moved themselves in the business of forming a State government. They were compelled to do it, or to encounter all the horrors of anarchy.

So in regard to New Mexico. The Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Texas will search in vain through the documents and records of Congress to find anything to show that there was Executive dictation in regard to the formation of a State government there. No, sir; just the very same recommendation was made by President Taylor as had been made by his predecessor. If the Senator will look at the annual message of President Polk of the very year previous, he will see that he himself said to Congress that, in the absence of an ability on the part of Congress to settle these distracting questions in any other mode, (either by the extension of the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, or by the courts, or by the doctrine of non-interference, all of which he recommended,) there was another course; and, said he, the time is not distant when, if you will wait, these people will make a government for themselves. General Taylor never advanced an inch beyond that recommendation made by his predecessor.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him this question: When General Riley issued his proclamation inviting the people to assemble at places of election, which he designated, to elect members to a State convention, did he do it with the approbation of the President of the United States at the time?

Mr. CLAYTON. Sir, he did it before the President of the United States had given him one word of advice upon the subject. He acted upon his own personal responsibility, and there has been the fatal error of the honorable Senator, and a great many others who have talked about this matter on this floor. I know how easy it was for them to get mistaken, but it is time that the truth of history should be corrected. I beg pardon of my friend from California for having taken up so much time by his leave. I could not be well restrained from an expression of some feeling on this occasion, and now I yield the floor to him.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, what the Senator from Delaware says in regard to the proclamation of General Riley is strictly true. General Smith sent a steamship of war down to Mazatlan early in 1849, to ascertain what was the action of Congress in regard to forming a territorial government, and he received intelligence that there had been no such government formed for California. Upon receipt of that information, General Riley, who was then the de facto Governor, being in command, issued a proclamation calling upon the people to elect delegates to a convention to form a State constitution, inasmuch as Congress had failed to create any government at all for them. This proclamation was issued before the agent of the General Government, of whom so much has been said, arrived there. I went up with him, and so did my colleague. It is well known in California that the whole movement for a State government was made outside of any Executive influence, and without any knowledge on the part of the Administration here that such a movement was in contemplation there.

Mr. CLAYTON. Entirely.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Virginia says the expenses of the convention were paid out of the military chest. The Senator is just as much mistaken in that as in his other assertion. Sir, there was a military exaction, a military contribution, levied upon the people of California, without the authority of law, which formed what was called the civil fund. There was no law, and no authority for the collection of that money, but the de facto Governor used a portion of that fund to pay the expenses of his de facto government, and also to pay the expenses of the convention.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me a moment? He says I made a mistake. I ask him if that fund, call it the civil fund, or what you please, was not a military chest, in the Federal Treasury? Was it not Federal money of the United States?

Mr. GWIN. No, sir; not a dollar of it was ever collected by authority of law; and up to last session there was not a scrap of paper in the Treasury to show anything about it. It was then unjustly paid into the Treasury of the United States by the action of this body, and the other House, years after it was collected. Not a dollar of a military fund was paid for such purposes. When the fund was paid into the Treasury these credits were allowed to General Riley, for his disbursements. Sir, the Executive government of the United States had nothing to do with the formation of the government of California.

Mr. CLAYTON. Nothing.

Mr. GWIN. I was a member of the convention which formed her constitution. We permitted no Government officer to approach us, or dictate to us, and tell us what we should do.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Delaware, in appealing to his own recollections, and correcting me in regard to history, makes a slight mistake himself. He will find, by reference to the documents, that at the time the Administration with which he was connected came into power, there was a subsisting order from the proper department of the previous Administration, to the officers of the United States in that region, to aid the authorities of Texas in extending her jurisdiction over what is now the Territory of

New Mexico, on this side the Rio Grande. He will find, further, that, after the incoming of the Taylor Administration, that order was changed by the War Department, and the officers there were then directed to stand back, and side neither with the people of New Mexico nor with Texas in that controversy; or, in other words, that they should remain neutral in the controversy which was known to be existing at that time. A few days before the next session of Congress, another order was issued to a Lieutenant Colonel McCall of the Army, who was sent to Santa Fe to take command, or for some other purpose. In that order Colonel McCall was directed to aid and encourage the people of New Mexico in forming a State government, if they desired to do so. These were the recommendations upon which those people acted. I remember it was denied at the time that any such order had been issued. I know that the agent who was sent up from Texas, Mr. Robert S. Neighbors, in his report to the Governor of Texas, stated that he had been met with an order of that description. It was stoutly denied at the time that any such order had been issued; and the records then were searched in vain for it; and now, if you look through the President's message and accompanying documents of that year, you cannot find it; but other documents will show that it was issued. If the Senator denies it, I will produce it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas may search the records from now until next Christmas, and he cannot find anything to show that the Executive, at the time to which he refers, initiated, or attempted to initiate, the steps for the organization of a State government, either in California or New Mexico. He can find there, however, that President Taylor was willing to do precisely what President Polk was willing to do, and had signified, in his last annual message to Congress, ought to be done. That I admit; but he went not one jot beyond it. President Polk had suggested, as the only remedy in the event of the failure of all other means of extending a government over those Territories, that Congress should await the action of the people of New Mexico and California; and that, at no distant day, they would form State governments for themselves. The order to which the Senator from Texas refers was an order to the officer not to exert himself to prevent the action of the people to form a State government; but that any agent, or any servant of the Executive, at that day, or at any other time within my knowledge, or the knowledge of any other man, as I believe, was instructed to initiate the steps, or to aid, to use the language of the honorable Senator, in the business of forming a State government, I deny.

Mr. HUNTER. Is this discussion in order? I have waited for some time to see if it would be disposed of; but I am constrained now to inquire whether it is in order to discuss the conduct of the Executive in regard to New Mexico and California upon this amendment?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not intend to occupy much longer time; but if it is in order to make an accusation, it is perfectly in order to reply to it, and to defend the Administration of which I was a member against it.

Now, sir, a word in conclusion, in regard to the controversy which existed between New Mexico and Texas. Texas claimed that her territory extended to the Rio Grande. No President that I know of ever admitted that. The honorable Senator says that instructions were given by a previous Administration to permit Texas to extend her authority there. It is clear, from what has occurred since, that she herself has admitted that she had not title there; at least she does not exercise jurisdiction to the Rio Grande. I can undertake to assure my friend from Texas that, so far as I have any recollection of the events of that day, the action of the Executive went to this extent only, as to the controversy between New Mexico and Texas, that, without the exertion of physical force on the part of the General Government, or on the part of the State government of Texas, the matter should be left to the decision either of Congress or of the judiciary. No effort was ever made, nor was a thought ever entertained, (and I do not suppose my friend imagines there was,) of despoiling Texas of anything that rightfully belonged to her. No motive could have existed for it. No such design existed. There is nothing in the history of the period to show or justify the suspicion that any design of that kind was ever entertained.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I will prove to the Senator that I was right in my history of these orders. On the 12th of October, 1848, Mr. Marcy, the Secretary of War, issued an order to the commander at Santa Fe, in which he said:

"In regard to that part of what the Mexicans call New Mexico, lying east of the Rio Grande, the civil authority which Texas has established, or may establish there, is to be respected, and in no manner whatever interfered with by the military force in that department, otherwise than to lend aid on proper occasions in sustaining it."

Then, on the 26th of March, 1849, another order was issued to the commander at Santa Fe, by the new Secretary of War, Mr. Crawford, in which this appears:

"It is presumed that the instructions from this Department of October 12, 1848, forwarded by the hands of Midshipman Beall, of the Navy, have been received by you some time since: nevertheless, I herewith furnish copies of the same.

"With respect to that portion of the instructions which is in the following words: 'In regard to that part of what the Mexicans call New Mexico, east of the Rio Grande, the civil authority which Texas has established or may establish there, is to be respected, and in no manner interfered with by the military force in that department, otherwise than to lend aid on proper occasions in sustaining it,' I have to remark that it is not expected Texas will undertake to extend her civil government over the remote region designated."

This, be it remembered, was at the very time when Texas was taking means to extend her civil government over that region. If the fact was unknown to the Administration, it was ignorant of what everybody else knew. The order continues:

"But should she do so, you will confine your action, under the clause above cited, to arranging your command in such manner as not to come into conflict with the authorities so constituted. On the claim of Texas to any or the whole of New Mexico east of the Rio Grande, it is not necessary to give an opinion, as Congress and that State alone have the power of adjusting it."

Thus in March, 1849, the previous order, given by the Secretary of War under Mr. Polk's administration, was changed. Then in November, a very short time before the meeting of Congress, the letter to which I referred was written by the Secretary of War to Lieutenant Colonel McCall. That letter, as I have remarked before, is not to be found in the message and accompanying documents for that year. It is in these words:

WAR DEPARTMENT, }
WASHINGTON, November 19, 1849. }

SIR: As you are about to join your regiment, now on duty in New Mexico, it has occurred to me as proper to make some observations on the peculiar condition of that and another Territory of the United States.

Since their annexation these Territories, in respect to their civil governments, have, in a great measure, depended on the officers of the Army there in command; a duty, it is considered, as falling beyond their appropriate spheres of action, and to be relieved from which cannot be more desired by them than by this Department. This condition has arisen from the omission of Congress to provide suitable governments, and in regard to the future there is reason to believe that the difficulties of the past are still to be encountered. In every possible aspect it is important, both to New Mexico and the United States, that these embarrassments should be quickly removed.

It is not doubted that the people of New Mexico desire and want a government organized, with all proper functions for the protection and security of their persons and property.

The question readily occurs, how that government can be supplied? I have already adverted to past and still existing difficulties that have retarded, and may continue to retard, the action of the United States in respect to this necessary and first want.

To remove it may, in some degree, be the part of the duty of officers of the Army, on whom, under the necessities of the case, has been devolved a partial participation in their civil affairs. It is therefore deemed proper that I should say, that it is not believed that the people of New Mexico are required to await the movements of the Federal Government in relation to a plan of government for the regulation of their own internal concerns.

The Constitution of the United States, and the late treaty with Mexico, guaranty their admission into the Union of our States, subject only to the judgment of Congress. Should the people of New Mexico wish to take any steps towards this object, so important and necessary to themselves, it will be your duty, and the duty of others with whom you are associated, not to thwart but advance their wishes. It is their right to appear before Congress and ask admission into the Union.

Other and complicated questions may arise which are considered as merged in this essential right of these people, and for the decision of which we must look beyond the authority of the Executive.

It will be instructive, and probably necessary, information, when the people of New Mexico form a constitution, and seek admission into the Confederacy of the States, to have your observations and views on their probable numbers, habits, customs, and pursuits of life.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE W. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of War.
Brevet Lieut. Col. GEORGE A. McCALL, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

If that was not encouraging the people of New Mexico, within the limits of the State of Texas, to form a State government for themselves, I confess my ignorance of the English language.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, sir, the Senator from Texas and myself do not interpret the language precisely alike. I say now that there is not a word in the letter which the honorable Senator has read which justifies the assertion that the Executive at that day sent an agent for the purpose of aiding in forming a State government.

Mr. RUSK. I never said so.

Mr. CLAYTON. It was said by others.

Mr. RUSK. If the Senator chooses to make a controversy with me, he ought not to put into my mouth what I did not say.

Mr. CLAYTON. The order which the Senator has read was that the officer was not to thwart, but to advance the wishes of the people. He was not told to aid them. He was the military commander, and could, by the strong arm, have put down the exertions of the people of the Territory to make a State government. He was directed not to do this. Then it comes back to the very point where Mr. Polk first introduced the subject: that, in the absence of any other remedy to procure government over these Territories, we should await the action of the people when they came to form States, rather than suffer the country to be distracted.

I do not propose to go further into the discussion of this matter, because I know the Senate has already been too long detained in regard to it. I never meant to deny the existence of the letters to which the honorable Senator has referred. There is no doubt that the President, in the fearful state of things then existing between the contending sections of this country, wished that the people of the Territories should settle the controversy for themselves as they pleased. It was not by any means the thing which he most desired to have done; but, if he could have nothing else done, to prevent the horrors of anarchy in these Territories, it was greatly to be desired that State governments should be formed there.

I rose only for the purpose of correcting what I supposed was an error in relation to the history both of California and New Mexico. I know very well that there was a contest as to the territory of Texas and the territory of the United States. There was a difference of opinion between the Government of the United States and the government of Texas in regard to that. The government of the United States did not entertain the idea that Texas was entitled to extend her territory entirely to the Rio Grande; and finally, the honorable Senator will admit, the question was settled upon a different basis. The territory of Texas does not extend there. A compromise was made. Texas gave up the country north of 36° 30', and the United States gave to her a considerable proportion of what had been claimed by the United States, to be part of the territory of New Mexico. The question was settled by a compromise; but, at last, it appears that Texas never did extend her territory to the Rio Grande. Under these circumstances, the President of the United States unquestionably would now, if they were existing again, feel himself obliged to restrain the hand of the State government, in perfect friendship, and with amiable intention towards it, until the Congress of the United States, or the judiciary, had properly decided on the whole question.

Mr. HUNTER. I do hope we shall have a vote on this amendment. We cannot settle this controversy upon it.

Mr. WELLER. I am very sorry to say anything which will probably continue this discussion, for I am as desirous as my friend from Virginia that the bill should be disposed of; but there have been some questions raised in the course of this debate which make it necessary, in my judgment, that I should say something.

Sir, I suppose it is a matter of very little importance now how California got into the Union. We are in the Union, and nobody proposes to put us out. We came in with some irregularity, it is true, but we hope, by our subsequent conduct, to justify the overlooking of that irregularity. Now, sir, it is due to truth that I should say that, so far as the Executive branch of the Government was concerned, I knew of no interference here in dictating the organizing of a State government in California. I went to that country, as is well known, in the spring of 1849. Congress had then adjourned, without providing any territorial government for the immense population then congregated upon the shores of the Pacific.

The Executive branch of the Government, looking to this omission of the Legislature, no doubt felt a great anxiety that some government should be organized which would give security to person and property. General Riley was then in command there, and by virtue of that command he was the civil Governor de facto of the State. He provided the people with all the government he could give them. He appointed their judges and their executive officers, and he gave, to a great extent, security both for person and property. Anxious to get rid of this responsibility, which he had assumed by virtue of his military office, he issued his proclamation requesting the people to appoint delegates to a convention, and there decide whether they would organize a territorial or a State government.

Was this any interference on the part of the Executive here, and was it any improper interference on the part of General Riley there? I hold that he, being the only officer there who could exercise any power, it was his duty to contribute, to the extent of his influence, towards the organization of a government.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would observe to my friend from California that he was appointed by Mr. Polk.

Mr. WELLER. Yes, sir, he had been sent out by the preceding Administration.

Mr. BROWN. Will my friend from California allow me, in this connection, to ask a question in reference to that matter? because it relates to a historical fact about which there has been a good deal of controversy, and which I should like to have settled. General Riley in his proclamation, calling upon the people of California to assemble and elect delegates to a convention, stated that the proceeding had the approbation of the President, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of War. It is well known that at that time Mr. Polk was dead, but his Secretary of State and his Secretary of War were still living. Feeling then, as I feel now, some solicitude as to what President and Secretaries were alluded to, I addressed a note to Governor Marcy, and one to Mr. Buchanan on the subject, and they both said that they were not the Secretaries alluded to as approving of that proceeding. I could not inquire of Mr. Polk because he was dead. Now I will ask the honorable Senator from Delaware, if he pleases—for he was the Secretary of State at that time—to say whether he was the Secretary alluded to?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; there was never a letter from me, or from any member of General Taylor's administration to General Riley, on the subject; but I tell the Senator without the least hesitation, that I do most cordially approve, and I should have approved at the time, the whole conduct of General Riley, if the question had been put to me; but no letter or verbal message on the subject was sent to him, that I ever heard of. General Riley's conduct, I think, has fully vindicated itself since.

Mr. BROWN. I am not calling in question at this time the propriety of that proceeding. I only wanted to know if I could arrive at the fact upon whom rested the responsibility of approving that proclamation, not pretending at this time to call it in question, for it is a proceeding which is past; but I have always been anxious to know what President, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State were alluded to in the proclamation as approving the proceeding.

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course I cannot tell, because immediately after General Taylor came into office, and before any agent of his had got to California, General Riley proceeded to act. I always supposed it might have been my predecessor who was referred to, but I do not know.

Mr. BROWN. He said not.

Mr. CLAYTON. There was nothing in the State Department to show.

Mr. GWIN. If my colleague will permit me, I can probably give some information in regard to what General Riley referred to. It is perfectly evident that he referred to the Administration which went out on the 4th of March, 1849; and although the Secretary of War and the Secretary of State, under President Polk's administration, may not have given him written instructions to that effect, he knew that he was acting in accordance with their views.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is what I have supposed.

Mr. GWIN. They sent out a special messenger, the Post Office agent, and to that Post Office agent, who was the only recognized civil officer of the Government there, the Secretary of State—the predecessor of the Senator from Delaware in that office—addressed an elaborate communication; and General Riley—who is now in his grave—told me that that officer conveyed to him the intimation that the former Executive Government sanctioned the course which he pursued in that matter.

Mr. BELL. I hope this question will cease here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. WELLER. I am sure I am quite as anxious to get the vote as the honorable Senator from Tennessee; but I am only desirous of stating some facts connected with the organization of my own State, which I think have been improperly understood.

Mr. CLAYTON. We shall be happy to hear the Senator.

Mr. WELLER. I was about to remark, that a large portion of the people of California disputed the authority of General Riley to direct the organization of a convention to form a State government. I belonged to that portion of the citizens who denied the authority of General Riley, although we approved his intentions; and therefore it was that in the county in which I resided, in selecting delegates to the State convention, we neither selected them in the number nor on the day prescribed; but, on the contrary, we doubled the number, and passed a resolution denying his authority to call a convention. Those delegates went to the convention, and got their seats.

I was at Monterey during a very considerable portion of the time that the convention was in session; and I know of no agent of the Federal Government there who was attempting to dictate the manner in which they should organize their government. All who knew my opinion on the subject, and every one who asked it obtained it, knew that it was in favor of a territorial government being first organized, and that we should ask for admission afterwards as a State; but the majority of the convention thought otherwise. My reason is a very obvious one. I knew it, would be a very expensive government, and I desired to throw the expense upon the Federal Treasury, instead of imposing taxes upon the people.

But, Mr. President, I rose only for the purpose of saying, that I think there is no resemblance between the admission of California and the payment of her Senators, and the proposed amendment from the Committee on Territories. Why, sir, the main objection to the admission of California was, not because she had not the requisite population; not because she was not entitled to a government; not because her people were not a sufficient number under the regular system to authorize her admission; but because of the irregular manner in which her proceedings had been conducted. But, sir, everybody knew that there was not a sufficient population in New Mexico to authorize even the highest grade of territorial government, much less a State government.

Now I suppose that the agents who have been referred to were paid in the House, because they were regarded as quasi Delegates; but we cannot recognize this man as a Senator. If he was a man of ability; if he was able to discharge the duties of a Senator, he must have known that it would have been utterly impossible to obtain a seat on this floor as a Senator from New Mexico, with her sparse population of Indians, Mexicans, and a few scattered soldiers.

Mr. BELL. I do not wish to discuss this matter any further on our part. I hope the vote will be taken. I wish merely to suggest that, with the consent of the Senate, I will amend the amendment, so that it shall be in this form:

For the payment of Richard H. Weightman, for mileage and per diem compensation as an agent, claiming to be a Senator-elect from New Mexico, $2,460.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Brodhead, Chase, Clayton, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Everett, Fessenden, Foot, Geyer, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Rusk, Thompson of Kentucky, and Wade—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Brown, Butler, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Slidell, Stuart, Weller, Williams, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend the bill in the following clause:

"For salaries and incidental expenses of the commission, appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling land claims in California, $37,500;"

by striking out "$37,500," and inserting in lieu thereof "$42,000." And then to add the following, which will explain my object in moving to increase the gross amount of the appropriation:

And that $5,000 of said sum be paid to Robert Greenhow, assistant law agent to said board, for services performed during the absence of the law agent.

I offer this amendment now, because, under the organization of that Board of Commissioners, a law agent and assistant law agent were appointed. The law agent who was originally appointed left the theater of his duties, and returned to his home. During his absence, for thirteen months and a half, the assistant law agent, Mr. Greenhow, was compelled to discharge the very arduous duties of both offices. All I propose by the amendment is simply to give him the compensation to which, I think, he is rightly entitled, for having performed the duties of both offices for the period of thirteen months and a half.

Mr. HUNTER. I feel it to be my duty to raise a question of order. Is there any estimate for this?

Mr. WELLER. I think it is an amendment of that character which requires no estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the appropriations for public land purposes:

For continuing the surveys in the northern portions of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, at the rates now authorized by law, $40,000.

I offer the amendment in pursuance of a recommendation and estimate from the proper Department, and with the unanimous consent of the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I also offer the following amendment from the same committee:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for the maps of the public lands authorized by the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of March, 1853, to be printed under the direction of the Committee on Public Lands, $5,150.

The resolution of the 3d of March is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and they are hereby, authorized to have printed the maps of the public lands, which are now prepared and in course of preparation."

This was adopted on the 3d of March, on the motion of Mr. Borland, formerly a member of the Committee on Public Lands. I will state a fact, of which the present Presiding Officer (Mr. Poor in the chair) is cognizant, owing to his position on the committee: Since we discovered that such a resolution was passed we have stopped the publication of the maps. This is to pay for the Arkansas maps, we having stopped the publication of the rest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the question was stated to be on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WELLER. There is one amendment upon which I ask for a separate vote; I went to change my own vote upon it. It is the amendment which was made in regard to privateer pensions.

Mr. PEARCE. I desire to have that amendment excepted myself.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to have the amendment in relation to the appropriation for surveys for the Pacific railroad excepted, because I have an amendment to move to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two amendments mentioned will be excepted, and the question will be first on concurring in all the rest of the amendments.

They were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on concurring with the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out—

"For paying pensions of invalids who were wounded on board of private armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain, from July 1, 1851, to June 30, 1854, $8,400."

And insert:

For payment of pensions of invalids who were wounded on board of private-armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain, up to January 1, 1853; and to reimburse the pension agents such sums as have been advanced by them for that purpose, $2,662.20.

Mr. PEARCE. In regard to that amendment which reduced the sum appropriated to privateer pensions, I wish to make a brief statement to the Senate, and state the reasons why I shall take a different course from that which I pursued the day before yesterday. All the statements which I made to the Senate then were, as I find, perfectly correct. I find that the fund was exhausted by the application first of the interest, and then of the principal. It was safely invested, and not a dollar of it was lost by bad investments. On the contrary, the fund was absolutely increased by the amount of $8,000, when the stocks in which it was invested were sold out.

But, sir, the fund was diminished by the action of Congress in a particular which I am inclined to think leaves an equitable claim on the part of these pensioners against the Government. The original acts pledged this fund to the payment of invalid privateer pensions, and pensions to the widows of those who were slain in the engagements of the privateers. Such were the pensions provided for by the act of 1814. By the act of 1818, I find that Congress added a new class of pensions, to wit, the widows of those who died by casualties during the period of their services. This was not contemplated by the original acts.

On looking at the papers which have been sent to me since the debate, I perceive that the proper pensions have amounted in all to not more than $5,900 in any year; when by the act of 1818, which extended them to the widows of those who died of casualties, the Government paid in one year $19,000. This difference continued for a considerable length of time.

The privateer pensions paid to invalids decreased rapidly; so that, in 1828, they amounted to only $2,850. They had never been more than about $5,900. The pensions to widows amounted to over $8,000 in 1817, and ran up, in 1820, to $19,471; so that it appears that it was the new class of pensions, introduced contrary to the pledge of the original act, which diminished and finally exhausted the fund.

Under these circumstances, I give up the objection which I had to the original appropriation as it came from the House. I believe it is equitable in the Government to make good to the invalids the pensions which they would have continued to receive but for our own legislation. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. GWIN. An amendment was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole appropriating $25,000 for the surveys and explorations for the proposed routes of the Pacific railroad. I move to strike out of that amendment $25,000, and insert $40,000. I have an estimate for it from the Secretary of War, and I am instructed by the select committee on the subject of the National railroad to make this motion. The object is to use the additional $15,000 to survey what is known as Noble's Pass through the Sierra Nevada Mountains, which is necessary to connect with the survey by Salt Lake. The Secretary of War says it is indispensable; and Lieutenant Whipple's party is in California, and his outfit, with this appropriation, will enable him to make that survey.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear the letter read.

It was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, March 25, 1854.

SIR: In reply to your note of yesterday, asking "for an estimate for an appropriation in the deficiency bill, for a survey of Noble's Pass through the Sierra range of mountains," I beg leave to refer you to my communication to the Senate and House of Representatives, dated February 6, 1854. I there request that an appropriation of "$25,000 be made to cover the deficiencies for the survey of a railroad route from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean," and I further state, that "should it be designed to make further explorations similar to those under consideration, it would be advantageous that early action should be taken for that purpose, so that the animals and equipments now on hand should be retained, and parties that are now organized be held together, by which the expense of reorganizing would be avoided, and the operations expedited."

No action having been taken by Congress, and no orders having been issued by this Department to hold these parties together, it is probable they have by this time been disbanded. An estimate, therefore, for the proposed exploration will embrace a new outfit of animals and camp equipments. It is proper, also, to suggest, that an exploration of any pass through the Sierra Nevada would not give definite results unless the survey connected with some other survey to the eastward; for, as has been shown heretofore, other ranges and spurs of mountains intervene between the Sierra Nevada and the plain stretching from the foot of the Rocky mountains to the valley of the Mississippi.

Under these circumstances, I do not feel authorized in estimating the cost of the exploration at a less sum than $15,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JEFF. DAVIS, Secretary of War,
Hon. W. M. GWIN, Senate United States.

Mr. HUNTER. If I understand the letter it is no recommendation. It merely estimates the amount that would have to be paid if Congress should think proper—

Mr. GWIN. No recommendation is required. It is the report of a committee of this body upon an estimate of the Department.

Mr. EVANS. What committee?

Mr. GWIN. The Committee on the national railroad. I consulted the members of the committee. The Senator was not in his seat.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that under the rules of the Senate such an amendment, to be in order to an appropriation bill, must be moved by order of a standing committee of the body.

Mr. GWIN. Cannot an estimate of a Department be moved without reference to a committee at all?

Mr. HUNTER. If accompanied by a recommendation it could be, but not without.

Mr. RUSK. This is certainly in order. We agreed to an amendment, in Committee of the Whole, appropriating $25,000, on the recommendation of the Department. The motion now is to amend that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is to increase the estimate.

Mr. RUSK. To increase the amount; and that, too, has been estimated by the Department.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a very different thing. The estimate which we agreed to is for surveys already performed, and on another route—by Governor Stevens, on the northern route. That is the amendment which we agreed to. This is for additional services to be performed hereafter, in the survey of Noble's Pass. The letter is no recommendation.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator is entirely mistaken. It was for additional surveys to be performed, the Secretary says expressly in his letter. He says, if you do not make the appropriation before the parties are dismissed he will have to estimate for new animals and equipments. One of these very parties is now engaged in surveying from the mouth of the Gila to El Paso; and part of the $25,000 which we have voted into the bill is to survey this route.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to have the amendment referred to, by which we voted for any additional survey. We voted to meet the liabilities incurred by Governor Stevens for the surveys which he performed. It was for surveys performed. This is to give authority for additional surveys—to survey another pass.

Mr. GWIN. Let us hear the amendment read.

Mr. BELL. I submit that this is within the rule, strictly speaking. An appropriation was made by the last Congress for the purpose of making surveys and explorations, in order that this Congress might be enabled, upon the return of the surveys, to come to some understanding as to which would be the most practicable and the cheapest route for the Pacific railroad. The pass now mentioned is suggested to be entirely practicable. No survey or exploration of it has yet been made under the appropriation made at the last session of Congress; and I submit, whether, under the circumstances now exhibited by this case, it is not a continuation of that appropriation? Unless we make it, the survey must be left unfinished.

ished for want of funds. This is not a pass in which I feel any particular interest, except that it may be important to the whole country. But, sir, if we are to do anything in regard to the construction of a Pacific railway, is it not desirable to have the explorations expedited and going on as quickly as possible?

The honorable Senator from Virginia is opposed to the whole project; I mean he is against any encouragement being given to it by this Government by way of subscription, or loan, or the credit of the Government; but, if his exception is taken, and shall prevail now, when shall we have a further appropriation on the subject? In the month of September or October; and not even at the next session of Congress, shall we have proper information before us to enable us to act intelligently upon the subject. I think honorable Senators might, under these circumstances, strain a point a little in their construction of the rule. The object is important. There is a pass which has not been explored heretofore. Intelligent gentlemen say that it is more practicable and feasible than any other yet spoken of in passing the Sierra Nevada. But it is proposed to reject the increased appropriation because it is not a deficiency. I allege it is a deficiency. It is so much of a work that was directed by the last Congress to be done. The appropriation proposed to be made is considered to be sufficient for the purpose of carrying out the design, and having complete explorations, as we should, of various passes. The work is unfinished. This is a deficiency; and it is very important to the public interest on other grounds that the appropriation should be made now.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his objection to the amendment. Let it be agreed to; and let us get through with the bill.

Mr. RUSK. I hope so; and I have to say but a word to show that he should. Certain passes have already been surveyed under the appropriation which has been made. This pass has not been surveyed. It should be done, so that we may have all the information we can get to lead us to act properly. Why not make the appropriation for it now as well as at any other time?

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the claims presented by certain counties of the late Territory of Iowa, for expenses of the United States district court, which were paid by said counties prior to the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State; and if, upon such examination, he is satisfied that, prior to said time, the said counties had paid money, which, in accordance with the instructions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated December 19, 1843, should have been paid by the marshal of the United States for said Territory, he is directed to audit and allow the same.

A report was made by the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session, and a similar one was made before, upon which appropriations were made to pay for the expenses which were incurred in the counties of Lee and Des Moines. This is to pay other counties which have not yet been adjusted at the Department. The matter has undergone the scrutiny of the Judiciary Committee, and by that committee approved as to the counties which I have mentioned. At this session the subject was sub-committed to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] who has been detained from the Senate some time by indisposition. He kept the papers in his hands, and for that reason, and that reason alone, the Committee on Finance have not offered the amendment. The papers are in his hands, or the committee would, I have no doubt, have offered the amendment. The matter has been heretofore investigated by the chairman of that committee, and by him, and other members of the committee, approved. I hope that the fact of the sickness of the Senator from Indiana will not operate to deprive us of this act of justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments made were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time, and it was read a third time, and passed. The title was amended, on the motion of Mr. BADGER by adding "and for other purposes."

REPORT ON MEXICAN CLAIMS.

Mr. BROWN. When the chairman of the committee on the Gardiner claim [Mr. BRODHEAD] made his report the other morning, I suggested the propriety of printing an extra number of copies of the report, knowing that it would be sought for. I have a letter in my hand from the public printer stating that it is now going through the press. Some thirty-five or forty pages are in press, and have been worked off. If any order for the printing of extra copies is to be made, it should be done now, or it will be more expensive. I therefore move that three thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule, the motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BROWN. I hope there will be no objection to it, and that it will be agreed to without being sent to the committee, as, I repeat, there is a necessity that the order should be made at once, if made at all. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it be now made.

The motion was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 31, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill from the Speaker's table; and if I can be permitted to explain in a few words the nature of the bill, I think the House will see the propriety of taking speedy action upon it.

The time for closing mail contracts, as gentlemen well know, expires on the 10th of April next. In the report of the Postmaster General, which I hold in my hand, you will find it stated that it is necessary, with a view of the transmission of the great mails from the East and the West, that he shall contract with the mail contractor to put a double line of stages between the cities of Montgomery and Mobile. For that purpose, he entered into a contract with the gentleman then carrying the mails for the second line. The original contract was for $36,000.

He agreed with the contractor that, if he would put on another line, he would pay him the sum of $24,000, or two thirds of the original contract. It was done with this stipulation, that inasmuch as he was to be put to the expense of double stopping on the line, he would recommend to Congress that they would authorize him, if the contract was properly fulfilled, to extend the contract; and with this stipulation also, that if Congress refused to extend it with him, or to authorize the Postmaster General to extend it, that then the Postmaster should pay him the sum of $6,000. I desire to read—

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from Alabama should proceed with his remarks?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will occupy but a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels it his duty to inquire of the House whether or not there is any objection to the gentleman proceeding with his remarks?

Mr. EDGERTON. I ask the gentleman from Alabama if the bill in question is not upon the Speaker's table, and if it will not be reached in the regular order of business. I understand, if the regular order of business is proceeded with, that it will soon be reached.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the gentleman objects, of course I must suspend my remarks.

Mr. EDGERTON. I am willing to oblige the gentleman, but the bill will be reached directly after proceeding to the regular order of business.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EDGERTON] objects, I will proceed no further.

We could take up the bill now and pass it in a very few minutes, if the House saw fit to do so. It would save the Government $6,000, which we might just as well save.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn? Mr. EDGERTON. It is not. I insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. DUNBAR, by the unanimous consent of the House, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana, asking for a grant of land for the benefit of an asylum for the deaf, dumb, and blind, and for educational purposes in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The following Senate bills upon the Speaker's table were then taken up in their order, and referred as indicated below:

An act for the relief of Theodore E. Elliott. Referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

An act for the relief of Dempsey Pitman. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act for the relief of Asbury Dickens. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act for the relief of Lieutenant A. J. Williamson. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act for the relief of William P. S. Sanger. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

An act for the relief of Mrs. Helen McKay, administratrix of Lieutenant Colonel Eneas McKay, late deputy quartermaster general of the United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act for the relief of W. R. Nevins. Referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

An act for the purchase of the copyright of a work published by Thomas H. Sumner, wherein he describes his new method of ascertaining a ship's position at sea. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act for the relief of the executrix of the late brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, United States Army. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Colonel Alexander G. Morgan. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A resolution for extending the existing contract for carrying the mail in Alabama.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement in reference to that resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let the resolution be read. The resolution was accordingly reported by the Clerk, as follows:

"Resolved, &c. That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to extend the existing contract for carrying the mail upon the route between Montgomery and Mobile, for four years from the time at which said contract shall expire by its own limitation, if, in his opinion, the public interests and convenience would be promoted by such extension of said contract."

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask that the bill be placed upon its passage; and for the purpose of showing the propriety of it, I will read to the House what the Postmaster General says of it in his report:

"There is, however, between Montgomery and Stockton, Alabama, another portion upon which delays and irregularities have been occurring to an extent equaling those on the sea route above referred to, although arising from quite different causes."

"One daily line of coaches has heretofore been provided, running (in connection with a steamboat between Mobile and Stockton) over a natural road of one hundred and sixty miles in length, frequently liable to obstructions from high water and other causes, and not kept in good repair, traversing, as it does, a sparsely populated section of country. Such mode of conveyance, upon such a road, has been found entirely inadequate for the vast accumulation of mails at Montgomery, conveyed thither from Boston, New York, and other cities, along the whole extent of that great line."

"Considering the increase in the amount of mail matter of all descriptions, especially printed matter, the transmission of bound volumes and other public documents, printed by order of Congress, increasing, as they do, from year to year, and of all the matter from the several Executive Departments of the General Government, also rapidly increasing in quantity, and in view of the fact, also, that all the mails for Mobile, New Orleans, and beyond, thus accumulated by contributions from Boston to Montgomery, are conveyed to the latter point by railroads and steamboats, especially the former, it is a matter of surprise that they have been forwarded by one daily coach in a manner at all approaching regularity."

"These facts rendered most imperative the necessity of providing immediately more adequate means of conveyance; and, accordingly, on the 18th of October last, a second daily line of four horse coaches was ordered between Montgomery and Stockton, Alabama, to connect with the steamboat line between Stockton and Mobile, with the stipulation that the contractors should furnish vehicles of sufficient capacity to convey whatever mail may be daily received at Montgomery or Stockton, and that the steamboat employed between Stockton and Mobile should be of sufficient size, structure, and fitness for the regular navigation of the Tennessee river, and be under the entire and exclusive control of the contractors, so that no breaches of connection should occur by reason of any other persons having a right to interfere with its arrivals and departures.

"The compensation allowed for this additional service is $24,000 per annum, being one third less than pro rata of the present pay, with the agreement that if the service shall be well and faithfully performed, the extension of the contract on the same conditions, over the succeeding term of four years, commencing the 1st of July, 1854, will be recommended to Congress; and should Congress decline to authorize such extension, the rate of additional pay shall be raised to $30,000 per annum, still one sixth less than pro rata, for the residue of the existing term.

"It was further stipulated that the contractors, by the 1st of November, 1853, should place on the route a full additional every-other day line, and double the road, if necessary, to carry off all the mail matter every day, and by the 15th of December a full additional daily line; the increased compensation to commerce, in case of a faithful compliance with these terms, on the 1st of November.

"The terms of this agreement are favorable, in view of the great public benefits expected to result therefrom.

"The stipulation as to this extension of the contract is reasonable and proper, because the present contract expires on the 30th of June next, and the contractors could not be expected to provide, at great expense, all the additional stock necessary for a second line, for seven or eight months only, without some guarantee against loss in case of being underbid in the competition at the next letting of contracts, the existing laws not providing, as was formerly the case, that new contractors shall purchase the stock of those superseded."

Mr. PHILLIPS. It will be seen from the extract from the report of the Postmaster General, which I have read, that the Post Office Department has recommended the passage of this bill from the Senate, now upon the Speaker's table, which authorizes the fulfillment of the contract. It will save to the Government the difference between the two amounts—that is, $6,000. The time when the bid expires is the tenth day of April next, and if the House intend to pass this bill at all, it ought to do so now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, if he has any information upon the subject, whether it is not probable that, if the matter should be left open for competition by bids, as all other routes in the country are, it would not be contracted for upon as favorable terms as this contract will be, even if he is paid the $6,000?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will merely answer the gentleman, not from my own information, or by an expression of my opinion—which I presume would not be worth much—but by merely calling attention to the opinion of the Postmaster General, which I have just read. His opinion is that it is a favorable contract for the Government, and that he is perfectly willing to extend it, and has recommended Congress to do so. My own opinion is, that it is worth nothing to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We have general laws upon the subject which require the Department to receive proposals. We had better leave this, it seems to me, to such general laws as apply to all other routes.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Alabama will allow me, I desire to say a word.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say that the road over which the mail is carried is a vital section of the great trunk over which the mail north and south is carried. One daily mail service was formerly performed over that line; but it was found that such service was inadequate for the prompt and certain transportation of the mails.

Last fall the Department found itself compelled, from the necessity of the case—from the fact that mail matter was left over at Montgomery frequently, until it accumulated to an immense quantity—to make an arrangement for a daily double service upon that section of the line. To put a double daily service upon that line would require an additional outlay upon the part of the contractor of $30,000. The contractor was unwilling to incur the investment of that large amount, in stocks and materials for the road, unless he should be assured of some probability of using it for a longer period of time than the seven or eight months during which the existing contract had to run. Why, sir, an investment of $30,000 in such stock as this, to be used only for six or eight months, would certainly be very hazardous, and be attended with great loss.

I would remark to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] even admitting it to be true—though I do not believe it is—that the Government, by receiving proposals, might let the contract as low as this, yet there is an obligation on the part of the Government towards the men who have made this large investment under the guarantee of the Post Office Department.

Again, the provision of law was, a few years ago, that when one contractor superseded another by reason of a lower bid for the route, he should take the stock and materials of his predecessor, upon a fair valuation of the same. But such is not the law now; and if this investment of $30,000 were made for the short time which the contract had to run, when there was no obligation upon his successor to take the property off his hands if he was underbid, it seems to me that we owe something to those contractors; and when the Postmaster General assures us that this is a favorable contract for the Government, I think it is as little as we can do for them to authorize the Postmaster General to extend it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The law, I believe, requires the Post Office Department to advertise for proposals for carrying the mails upon the different routes. Those who bid for the contracts must inform themselves in relation to the service to be performed; and they undertake to carry the mails upon those routes for the terms specified. I know it has been urged at the Department, that though the amount of mail matter should increase, yet the Department had no authority to increase the amount of compensation. If the contractor undertakes to carry the mail between two given points, and he can do it on horseback, he may do it in that manner; but if it requires a line of coaches, or if it requires a dozen lines of coaches, the contractor, according to the law and the ruling of the Post Office Department, in the great majority of cases, must comply with the terms of his contract at whatever cost. It does seem to me that it is rather bad policy for Congress to commence letting mail contracts in particular cases by special legislation.

Mr. OLDS. I think the gentleman from Tennessee, who has just taken his seat, is under a misapprehension in reference to this bill. This contract, which the Postmaster General asks us by this resolution to extend, is not the regular contract made under the general letting four years ago. If I understand it, the contract made then proved to be a failure, and this contract was entered into with this party to continue until the time of the next regular letting, as the document read by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] shows. It is therefore a special contract, and does not come under the general rule with respect to contractors at all.

It is, perhaps, due to the House that I should say in this connection, that there are representations being made to the effect that if this contract is not extended, and the opportunity is given for bids to be offered in the usual manner, that such will be the competition as to reduce the amount below that which the Postmaster General asks us to pay this contractor. I do not state this from any reliable information; I have been told these things from outsiders, who have made such representations in regard to this matter.

My own opinion is, that inasmuch as there is a seeming necessity for the passage of this bill, we had better pass it at once. If it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, such is the press of business which is likely to be thrown upon the House from the Committee on Public Lands—which is likely to monopolize a great portion of the time of the House during the balance of the session—that we should not be likely to get an opportunity to report it back.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. OLDS. I am not out of order; but if the gentleman makes a point of order, I will await the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Public Lands have nothing before the House, nor is there anything before the House with which they have any connection.

Mr. OLDS. No, sir; they have nothing before the House, and I do not want them to have anything here for a good while to come. But, sir, my remarks were perfectly in order, as showing the reason why this bill should not be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I was speaking to the point that, if it was sent to that committee, we should not get an opportunity of reporting it back until the time should have elapsed for the reletting of this contract, and it would be too late to avail anything. That is my reason for putting the bill upon its passage at this time. I will have no contention with the Committee on Public Lands. If the House propose to allow that committee to monopolize their time for the remainder of the session, I will not be responsible for it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point I wish to present in reference to this contractor is this: Even if it should be admitted that, by throwing this contract open to bids, we could obtain terms as good, or better than those now offered, it seems to me that the Department is under some obligations to this individual, who has made an investment of $30,000 in stock, materials, &c., which his successor is not bound to take, and which, of course, will prove a heavy loss to him, unless some arrangement should be made to secure the contract to him in future. The Postmaster General advises us that this additional service is obtained for one third less compensation than the original, by public bids accepted under the rules for bidding at the Department; and it seems to me that that, of itself, goes far to show that we could not get it any cheaper if it were opened to competition. It was opened to competition, and the Postmaster General tells you that the bid at which it was originally let was $36,000. Now it is proposed to be done for one third less. Individuals propose under contract to carry it for $24,000, incurring the obligation on the part of the Department, that a strong recommendation shall be made to Congress for authority to continue that contract, if in the language of the joint resolution, he deems it for the public good to do so.

We have examples of this sort of legislation. Congress did this precise thing in a case which presented itself with much less force to our sympathies and favorable regard—that of carrying the mail from here to Aquia Creek, on the Potomac river. And another instance of this character of legislation, precisely in point, was in carrying the mail from New Orleans to Mobile. The extensions of these contracts were made in this way, under peculiar circumstances, which existed, and were brought to bear on the Department, forcing it to incur this sort of additional obligation before it could induce an enterprising gentleman to invest a large amount of money in stock which might be thrown on his hands as useless and unprofitable.

I think that this case appeals to the favorable regard of Congress very strongly; and I hope that the House will pass the resolution.

Mr. GREY obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GREY. I ask that the joint resolution be read. I was not in the Hall when it was taken up for consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. GREY. Mr. Speaker, if I were not a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I do not know that I would say anything about this matter; but, sir, representations have been made to me within the last few days, which, I think, the House ought to know and consider. When the House is informed of certain facts, I am sure they will refer this joint resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for investigation. That resolution asks that Congress shall authorize the Postmaster General to extend a contract which, by its stipulations, terminates in July next, for four years more, to certain contractors, without any "bidding," or the competition guaranteed by law between individuals for mail contracts. I was shown a letter yesterday by a gentleman of this city, which he told me was from one of the most extensive and responsible mail contractors in Alabama, in which he protested against giving to these contractors an extension of their contract for four years, as contrary to the general laws, and in violation of the rights of other bidders. He protests against granting that contract except at the general "lettings," and according to the laws regulating all "mail contracts."

Sir, what are the facts in this case? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] was understood to say that they were carrying the mail for $24,000 per annum.

Mr. HOUSTON. I said that the double service was done for $24,000. That was an amount equal to two thirds of the original contract; $36,000 was the amount of the first contract. It was accepted by the Department under the regular bidding. This increased service, though equal to the original mail service, was assumed by the contractors for $24,000.

Mr. GREY. I ask if that contract was not made with Mr. Wade Allen, to terminate the 1st of July next, for daily service, at $36,000 per annum?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know. There was a contract with Wade Allen, or Wade Harris—Allen, I believe—but I am informed this day by the Postmaster General himself, that the Department never has been able to get a contract properly carried out on that section of the route. The contractors who have preceded the energetic gentleman who has it in charge at present, have made constant and continued and annoying failures in carrying the great mail North and South, to the disturbance of the Department.

I wish to say one word more whilst I am upon the floor. The Postmaster General told me also, this morning, in connection with the present contract, that it has been faithfully and punctually performed, and that there have only been a few insignificant failures. It has been infinitely better performed than it ever has been by any other contractors on that section of the route.

Mr. GREY. The gentleman does not answer my question. I want to know what was the contract price per annum allowed to the lowest bidder at the last "lettings" of mail contracts? which is the contract those present contractors recently "bought out" from Wade Allen.

Mr. HOUSTON. Thirty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. GREY. Well, that is all I ask to know. Sir, I will tell you what I am informed in relation to this matter. That Wade Allen has had this contract for two or three terms of four years, and had it at different rates of compensation. He took the contract for daily service between Montgomery and Mobile for one term at $26,000 per annum, then at $31,000 or $32,000, then down again to a lower rate, and his last contract was at $36,000. Now, Wade Allen, I learn, was a man of wealth, and responsible; and if he failed to perform the service regularly, the Postmaster General was authorized to fine, deduct, or forfeit and relet the contract, and was not authorized by law to receive him as a bidder at future lettings.

But I am informed Wade Allen was the legally accepted contractor for the four years ending the 30th June next; that he has been dead for a year or two, and his representatives have carried on that mail service. If he had been a defaulter, the Postmaster General would certainly have obeyed the requirements of the law, and forfeited his contract, readvertised under the law for public competition among bidders, and relet the route in that way, instead of giving it by a private contract to any certain individual. But, sir, it is not charged that Wade Allen or his representatives were defaulters. It seems, sir, that last winter a gentleman who was or had been a special and confidential agent of the Post Office Department, entered into an arrangement with another, by which they bought this contract of Mr. Wade Allen's representatives, well knowing it terminated on the 30th of June—bought it last winter. That contract was for a daily mail between Montgomery and Mobile, at the rate of $36,000 per annum; and they have been allowed $24,000 per annum more, making for that service between Montgomery and Mobile $60,000 per annum.

Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman's [Mr. Houston's] remark as to the punctuality and regularity of the mails since those "energetic contractors" have been performing the service, I will remark that the members of this Congress, and the newspapers, North and South, will, and have protested, that the mails to and from the South have never been more irregular than during the past winter.

Now, sir, I ask whether, when there is only one mail a day from this city to Montgomery, and one mail a day from Montgomery on towards Vicksburg, for Arkansas, North Louisiana, and all the West, and only one mail a day from Mobile to New Orleans, do we want two mails a day between Montgomery and Mobile?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know whether the gentleman from Kentucky was in the House when I read what is stated by the Postmaster General.

Mr. GREY. I was not in the House at the time, but I presume I have been informed of all the positions taken by the Postmaster General in his report.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman from Kentucky asks what is the necessity of another daily line between Montgomery and Mobile, when there is a daily line from Montgomery to Mobile and New Orleans? I will answer the gentleman by saying that the mail is carried from Mobile to New Orleans by steamboat.

Mr. GREY. There are many members of this House living in the South, and they know that a large mail goes from Montgomery on, in daily coaches, by Columbus and Jackson, Mississippi, to Vicksburg, for Arkansas and the northern part of Louisiana, and connected with the daily mail boats running upon the Mississippi river between Louisville and New Orleans. How does it happen that such an immense amount of mail matter goes from Montgomery to Mobile? We pay millions to send our mails by ocean mail steamers from New York to Cuba, to Mobile, and the different ports of Mexico. I do not think, from my knowledge of the mails through the country, that there is so great an amount of mail matter which ought legally and properly to pass on the route from Montgomery to Mobile as requires two daily lines of four-horse coaches to carry it.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE here made an interruption, which was entirely inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. GREY. I submit to this House whether, if two daily lines are necessary there, it is not by law made the positive duty of the Postmaster General to advertise and contract for that grade of service at the regular mail lettings, which come off every four years? If semi-daily service is necessary there, I do not object. The point I make is, that it should not be given by a private contract to any one, in violation of law and of the rights of regular bidders. Let all have a fair and equal chance, and let the Government have the advantage of the saving resulting from that open competition. Such is the point I make against all special legislation for individuals.

This special agreement is this: They were allowed $24,000 extra for carrying the very identical mails for which the contract, just then purchased of Wade Allen, paid them $36,000 for carrying, and to have the contract secured to them for the next four years at the $60,000 per annum, without any competition with other bidders.

Had the Postmaster General any right to make such a contract? He now acknowledges he had not, but asks Congress to authorize him to do so. Mr. Speaker, whatever might be my confidence in his wisdom, I will refuse to do so, because there is neither justice, propriety, or necessity for exempting this route from the usual and legal mode of contracting.

Sir, my observation has taught me to believe that too great discretionary power should not be given to those in authority. I will state a case by way of example. A Mr. Buckles, of Kentucky, had a contract for carrying the mails in steamboats from Louisville to St. Louis at $10,000 per annum. Buckles was not on good terms personally with everybody at the Post Office Department, and during the ice and fogs of winter made failures, and perhaps did not do his full duty. He was heavily fined—deductions made from his pay—his contract forfeited—and the usual month's extra pay allowed (by law) when contracts are forfeited was withheld from Buckles.

In less than two months after the contract of Buckles was forfeited, another contract was made with Shirley & Co., for steamboat service on the same route, from Louisville to St. Louis, at much higher price, and without any public advertisements, or any competition permitted between bidders. This special contract with Shirley & Co. was first made in 1851. Under a law of last Congress the Postmaster General advertised for proposals or bids to be sent in by "3 p. m. of the 10th day of February, 1853, to be decided on or before the 1st of March following, for conveying the mails of the United States, for four years from 1st July, 1853," on this river route from Louisville to St. Louis, (and on other river routes.)

The bids were sent in, accepted, and the contractors officially informed on the 2d March, 1853, of such acceptance. The contract was executed by the parties. Yes, sir, indorsed, "SIGNED, SEALED, AND DELIVERED BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL."

Yet, Mr. Speaker, after all that these lowest bidders and contractors are refused the privilege of carrying that mail under their contract from Louisville to St. Louis, and Shirley & Co. are now performing that very service, and that, too, without any contract for it, but for which the Postmaster pays to them and the agent's messengers about $90,000 per annum; yet Shirley & Co. perform very little more service than Buckles did for $10,000 per annum.

I state here, from information from the Post Office Department, that Shirley & Co. are now pretending to perform that service without a contract, but are allowed, including agents, about $90,000 per annum, all of which is (I believe) charged against the State of Kentucky for "mail facilities;" yet those facilities furnished by them to Kentucky, for the last nine months, have been worse than worthless.

Such, Mr. Speaker, has been the result of a "discretion" exercised on that route along the northern border of Kentucky. Forbid the exercise of "discretionary powers," and enforce the law in regard to "lettings" and lowest bidders, and all will be right. At all events, we can then understand how far the law allows the Postmaster General to go.

But, sir, as to this special, or discretionary, or private contract between Montgomery and Mobile. How is it that such great injury is apprehended to the interests and convenience of the public if this contract is not renewed, secured, and extended for four years to those gentlemen? It was entered into last winter, with a knowledge that it would terminate in June next. Sir, reject this proposition, and, my word for it, this route will at the regular "mail lettings" on the 10th of next month, be "let" to responsible contractors who will perform the service much better than it has been performed during the last winter and spring. Sir, I shall move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Let it take the course which legislation of a general character takes. All private bills that are brought up for the relief of injured claimants, some of whom have been appealing to this House for long years to do them justice, are referred to appropriate committees, to be examined in all their bearings, and reported upon fully to the House. Sir, I understand a gentleman who is, or has been a "special and confidential agent of the Post Office Department," and his partner, bought out this contract, and that, very soon afterwards, this extra allowance was made. Why was it not allowed to the previous contractor? He, it seems, had for many years carried all those mails in a daily line of coaches; and if the present contractors cannot do it, then "let" the service accordingly to him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not hear distinctly the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky. Will he please repeat them?

Mr. GREY repeated as above.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the name of that gentleman? Will the gentleman from Kentucky please to give us his name?

Mr. GREY. Certainly. I will give the gentleman from Alabama the name of a Mr. Metcalf as the person to whom I allude. And I ask the gentleman from Alabama whether that person is not one of those contractors?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know whether he is or not. I never heard of him as being one of the contractors.

Mr. GREY. Do you say he is not one of the contractors?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, I do not; he may be one of them.

Mr. GREY. And does the gentleman from Alabama know whether Mr. Metcalf is, or was a "special confidential agent" of the Department?

Mr. HOUSTON. I know that he was one of those special agents.

Mr. GREY. Is he at present?

Mr. HOUSTON. He is not now one of the special agents of the Department?

Mr. GREY. Was he last winter?

Mr. HOUSTON. He was an agent during the last Administration; but I understand he was superseded before the contract in question was made.

Mr. GREY. Was he during last winter one of the special agents of the Department?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I think he was not. I know that Mr. Metcalf was a special agent of the Post Office Department under the last Administration. But after the present Administration came into power he fell.

Mr. GREY. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] know that he fell before this contract was entered into?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know that. I cannot undertake to give a positive answer to that question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am informed that Mr. Metcalf was removed before this contract was made, or before it was even talked about.

Mr. GREY. I am not throwing out any imputation on the motives or character of Mr. Metcalf while he was special confidential agent of the Post Office Department. I do not charge that there was any impropriety in his becoming interested in the contract, or that he had no legal right to buy out the contract if he thought proper to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to the fact that that could be, and had for years, and up to the past winter, been carried in daily coaches.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Will he permit me to interrupt him for that purpose?

Mr. GREY. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky know that the Post Office Department had been endeavoring to obtain the double daily service between Montgomery and Mobile for months before they accomplished that object?

Mr. GREY. No, Mr. Speaker; I know nothing about that; though I know, as doubtless does a hundred other members on this floor, that when we have (during this session) applied at the Post Office Department to get increased or a change of facilities, the answer has always been that "the present contracts terminate so soon we cannot make alterations until the lettings in April."

There is a daily line of boats from Montgomery to Mobile on which the mails could be sent.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, then, I can tell the gentleman from Kentucky that the Post Office Department had been endeavoring to obtain this double daily service upon that section of road for months before they ever accomplished it.

Mr. GREY. Then, Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General was, by law, obliged to advertise for bids for that service, if he knew so long beforehand that it was needed. But, sir, double daily contract was made without the authority of law, and is now brought before Congress to get them to sanction and indorse it; and I will do justice to those, and to other contractors, by refusing to do any such thing.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) I wish to ask the gentleman another question. Does the gentleman from Kentucky —

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order, unless the gentleman from Kentucky yields the floor.

Mr. GREY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to know if the gentleman from Kentucky takes the ground that, where the force is not sufficient to carry the mail, the Postmaster General has no power to enter into a contract by which the mail may be carried?

Mr. GREY. When a mail contractor cannot carry the mail which he is bound to carry by the terms of his contract, the local postmasters upon the route have authority, by law, to make a special contract to have the mail carried until the Postmaster General shall readvertise and relet the route.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is in case of a failure of the contractor. But in cases where the mail accumulates so that it cannot be carried according to the contract, and the contractor is not bound to increase the service, I ask the gentleman if he takes the ground that the Post Office Department has no right to make a contract to secure the performance of the necessary service?

Mr. GREY. I reply to the gentleman from Alabama, that if the contractor does not and cannot carry the mail, the postmasters are authorized to have it carried on, and to make out and present their accounts for doing so in their next quarterly returns; and if it is impossible for the contractor to carry the mails as he has contracted to do, then it is obligatory on the Postmaster General to readvertise and relet. In extreme cases, the greatest latitude allowed by law is for the Postmaster General to make "temporary contracts," to exist until he can have had time to advertise for bids. That is the law.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the matter of law.

Mr. GREY. The gentleman will pardon me. I am not mistaken in the law, or in the justice which urges that every contractor ought to be put upon the same footing, and that all shall have an equal chance at the regular bidding time. I am opposed to violating the general law, and opposed to giving any Postmaster General the authority to depart from it; which has often been done, I know, with great and crying injustice.

In conclusion, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to occupy the attention of the House but a few moments further in reference to this subject. My object is to free the mind of the committee from the impressions which may have been created by the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I rise to a question of order. The remarks of the gentleman are not in order, as the previous question has been called.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It has not been called. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. JONES. The previous question was called for by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] was recognized by the Chair, and no one was recognized who demanded the previous question. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GREY. And called the previous question; but I withdraw it with pleasure, if desired by my friend from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the demand, and recognized the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to relieve the House from the impressions which may have been made by the remarks of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] in reference to the contractor in the case under consideration, Mr. Metcalf. The gentleman stated to the House that Mr. Metcalf held some official relation to the Post Office Department, as a special agent, and hence that a contract made by the Department with him, who held this relation, would be a transaction which would justly subject him to suspicions, and justify the animadversions of the gentleman himself. But so far from that being the case, Mr. Metcalf, who had been a special agent of the Post Office Department, was removed by the Department before the contract was entered into.

Mr. GREY. I wish to remind the gentleman that I stated in my remarks that I did not charge fraud upon the part of the contractor in his connection with the Government, neither legal nor moral wrong to Mr. Metcalf in taking this contract. But I ask the gentleman a question. I ask him, upon the start, if the law of the Post Office Department is not this, that when the contractor fails to perform his contract to carry the mail from one point to another upon his route, if the contractor does not bid for his route, with the understanding that when he entered upon it that he should carry the whole mail? If he has a daily service only he must carry the whole mail, and if he does not the postmasters upon the route are to contract with others to carry the mail, and the amount of the cost of such new contract is to be deducted out of his pay from the Government. I ask the gentleman if he does know that the Postmaster General has no right to add an additional allowance to a contractor for carrying an extra quantity of mail? That matter has been decided already by the Post Office Department.

Mr. OLDS. I will reply to my colleague upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It is with reference to the power of the Postmaster General to contract for additional service that I am speaking.

The gentleman will recollect that when bids are made for carrying the mail a certain service is stipulated for. For instance: a contract may be entered into for carrying the mail between two given points twice or three times a week; but that does not preclude the Postmaster General, upon petitions being presented, showing that a daily mail is required, from contracting for carrying a daily mail, and from paying an additional pro rata allowance for it. So in this case the fact that the Postmaster General has made a contract for carrying a daily mail does not preclude him, if he becomes satisfied that the wants of the service require it, from contracting further for carrying the mail twice a day, and paying an additional pro rata compensation therefor. He cannot, however, pay higher than a pro rata compensation in addition.

Mr. GREY. With the consent of the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to make a statement, for the benefit of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. This question has already been decided by the Post Office Department. Some years ago a contract was made with Mr. Eastham for carrying the mail from Louisville to St. Louis daily; at the same time a contract was made with Mr. Campbell and others, to carry the great eastern mail crossing at Wheeling, on by Columbus, Dayton, Terra Haute, &c., to St. Louis. Campbell, though, carried over his route only a horse-back mail, and sent the great eastern mail by Cincinnati, and by the Ohio river, to Louisville, where it was thrown on to Eastham's route from Louisville to St. Louis.

The agent of the Department (sent out to investigate the grievances Eastham complained of) testified to the Postmaster General, that the mail thrown on Eastham's route, which was to have gone by way of Campbell's route, gave to Eastham from three to four times the amount of mail he, Eastham, had contracted to carry. Eastham, proved, that in consequence of that mail illegally thrown on him he had lost one hundred horses, and lost largely by its breaking down his coaches; yet in that case, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. OLDS] knows the Postmaster General refused to make an extra allowance to Eastham, but referred him to Congress "for mercy."

Mr. OLDS. Certainly; but that does not affect the position I have taken. I stated a moment ago that this obligation was for increased pay for carrying the mail under a contract which had been extended to provide for increased service.

Mr. GREY. Did not the gentleman state, that the increased service was putting on an additional stage upon the line? Eastham complained and remonstrated, and proved he had been obliged to employ increased coaches and horses to carry the extra mail.

Mr. OLDS. Certainly.

Mr. GREY. Then how does the increased service differ from that in the case I have just stated?

Mr. OLDS. The difference is this: In this case the increase was for service which was not stipulated for in the original contract made with the Postmaster General. The original contract provided for a daily mail, but it was found that the service required that the mail should be carried twice a day. This I hold to be a kind of additional service, which the Postmaster General may authorize, and make an additional pro rata allowance therefor.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It is not my purpose to extend this debate, for the House have already had enough of it to satisfy them of the propriety of the resolution. My object in rising was to correct a sort of imputation which seems to have been cast upon the Postmaster General. There is no sort of connection, political or official, between him and Mr. Metcalf. So far from his being an agent or favorite with the present Postmaster General, he was one of those who was removed by him from all official relations with that Department. There is, therefore, no favoritism to be brought to bear on the subject. Gentlemen understand that, and I hope that all said about Mr. Metcalf being an agent of the Post Office Department will go without effect on the existing proposition.

Mr. GREY. With the gentleman's permission, I will remind him that I did not charge fraud against the contractors, though the contract was illegally made, else Congress would not be called on to ratify it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Then I do not see what was the necessity of stating to the House that Mr. Metcalf was an agent of the Post Office Department.

But there is another matter, and it is this: On the great mail route going from the northeast to the southwest, from Maine to the city of Montgomery, there is a connecting line of railroad, with the exception of some ten or twelve miles; however, I believe that is now completed.

There is a great line of railroads running from the extreme northeast section of the country on towards New Orleans, terminating at the city of Montgomery. From the city of Montgomery to Mobile is the only line which is not traversed either by railroad or steamboat. At Mobile the line is continued by steamboat, so that here is the only gap where staging is used from your extreme northeast to your extreme southwest; and this is the great mail line between those sections. Now, the gentleman asks, what is the necessity of double service?

Mr. GREY. I only asked the question; but did not state positively that there was no necessity for double daily service. I made it a point that, if that service was given, it, like all other contracts, should be free and open to bids from all the world.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Precisely. That is a question of opinion between the gentleman and myself, which I do not propose to answer. I have shown why it is that a double service is preferred. Now, when we come to the point which the gentleman has now made as to how that service should be contracted for, the gentleman may maintain his own opinion.

Mr. GREY. I maintain the execution of the laws as made and provided for such cases.

Mr. PHILLIPS. But I say that here is a contract made by the Postmaster General for a double line at two thirds of the price which he contracted to pay for a single line. These gentlemen are efficient contractors. They were induced by the representations of the Postmaster General to take the contract for the unexpired term of six or eight months at the reduced rate of compensation. The Postmaster General agreed with them that, if that contract were properly fulfilled, he would urge on Congress to give them an extension of it; and stipulating further, that if Congress did not see fit to take his recommendation, then, with a view of making up something as compensation for damages sustained, that the contract, instead of being rated at $24,000, should be rated at $36,000. They will get the latter amount, if Congress does not choose to extend the contract, as agreed by the Postmaster General.

If we have any reliance on the judgment and discretion of the Postmaster General in a matter of this sort, when the contract is made at two thirds of the price for which the original contract was made, when we are satisfied with the necessity of the transaction: I say, that if we have the slightest confidence in the man who stands at the head of this Bureau, the House would not, under the circumstances, refuse to concur in his recommendation. I call for the previous question.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his call for the previous question, as my colleague desires to submit a few remarks on the subject?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I withdraw the call for the previous question, so that the gentleman may be heard.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks in regard to this contract, and I do so for the purpose of opposing the motion which has been made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

It seems that he bases the whole of his argument upon the fact that the present mail service between Mobile and Montgomery is a most admirable one, and that if the service is let out by contract, as all the other mail lines in the United States are let out, we shall have either no mail, or a very inefficient service, on that route.

It is a matter notorious to the gentleman, as it is to the whole country, that the mail service on the southern routes is at this time, and has been all winter, and, I may say, for all time, anything else than a perfect service. I think that we could not possibly be injured by letting out this contract according to law.

We are told that there is a double service on the Montgomery and Mobile line. Why? Because a single trip per day is not sufficient. Suppose a double line should prove insufficient, you are bound by your contract to a double service, and you will not be able to increase it to a triple one, except by paying $24,000 or $30,000 more.

Sir, I understand—I may be mistaken in regard to the law, but it has been dinned into my ears time and again by the Post Office Department—that they have but three ways of letting contracts. One is an agreement by which the parties undertake to carry the mails with certainty and celerity; there is one for horse-back service, by which the parties agree to carry the mails on horse-back; and the third is for carrying the mails by coaches. The mail service is different; but all the contracts are for carrying the mails—not a portion of the mails; and if one coach a day is not sufficient, if I understand the law correctly, two coaches must be put upon the line.

I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] that if it is found necessary that the mails shall be carried twice a day, when the contract is to carry it only once a day, in that event it would be perfectly proper and advisable to give additional compensation for the extra service. All these contracts are let to parties—to do what? To carry the mail; not to carry it twice a day, but once a day, or tri-weekly, or weekly, under the contract.

I should like this matter to be investigated by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I want to know whether the Postmaster General has not violated the law by giving $24,000 additional to these parties for carrying the mail once a day? I am opposed to this thing. I do not believe we should lose anything by letting out this contract, and allowing all the world to compete for the service. I am in favor of the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and on that motion I move the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question now being on referring the joint resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,

Mr. ABERCROMBIE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on referring the resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

DIFFICULTY SETTLED.

Mr. PRESTON. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of making an explanation in relation to a personal matter which transpired upon this floor. It is yet in the memory of the House, that the debate which recently occurred between Mr. CURTIS, of New York, and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, was marked by personalities. The character of that debate led to its discussion outside of the walls of this House. So far as Mr. CURTIS was concerned, he referred the matters in controversy to his friend, Colonel Monroe, of New York, and General Shields, a Senator from Illinois. So far as Mr. BRECKINRIDGE was concerned, he referred the matters in controversy to his friend, Colonel Hawkins, of Kentucky, and myself. I am authorized by these gentlemen, sir, to state that the matters in dispute have been settled in a manner which is mutually satisfactory, and which is conceived alike honorable to both the gentlemen who were engaged in the debate.

I have also another duty to discharge on behalf of these gentlemen, and as they transgressed in that debate the rules of order established for the government of this House, to express their mutual regret that this should have occurred, and to ask its indulgence as a body for a violation of its rules. It is a source of gratification to us that the controversy between these gentlemen, who give strong promise of future usefulness to their country, and who are already admired by a large circle of acquaintance, has been adjusted in a manner which I am convinced will be entirely satisfactory to all their friends. I thank the House for their indulgence.

The Senate bill for the relief of John Gusman was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a communication from the Governor of Oregon submitting a detailed statement of the expenditure of money appropriated by Congress for the use and benefit of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the ex-Governors of the States of this Union be admitted within the Hall of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. OLDS. It changes the rules, and must go over.

The SPEAKER. It goes over, unless unanimous consent be given for its introduction.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENN. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his motion for a moment to enable me to offer a resolution asking for information, and to which no objection will be made.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I always dislike to refuse any courtesy to gentlemen, but others may stand in the same situation; and I prefer therefore not to withdraw my motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. Bockock's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAVEN in the chair, (Mr. HAMILTON, the former chairman, not being in the Hall.)

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee is the special order of the House on the consideration of House bill No. 52. The question before the committee is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

At the end of the first section add the following words: Provided, That in the mean time, to enable the Secretary of the Navy to fit up for use vessels already built; and to obtain efficient seamen, at whatever rate of wages he may find it necessary to pay, he is authorized to use such portion of the appropriation made in this bill as may be necessary.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not recollect whether there was any opposition made yesterday to this amendment. Is debate upon it in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate was exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move an amendment to that amendment:

Provided, The sum to be employed for such purpose shall not exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, while I would make that limitation in regard to the expenditure for the purposes designated in the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, I would at the same time recommend that a portion of that fund—as we cannot immediately procure another appropriation for it—be used for the completion of vessels that are now in our yards and docks, for the service of the country. It is with ships, sir, as it is with houses, if they do not have tenants and employment, they go to ruin. They are much worse when untenanted than if they were employed; and it is quite unnecessary for us to be expending large sums of money in this way for the increase of the Navy, when we refuse to expend small sums for the completion of those vessels that have been already commenced, or for the repair of those that are lying in our docks, and which could be rendered useful and efficient by the expenditure of small sums. How many vessels of this kind there are in our ports and docks I cannot say. I am aware there are some, and that our docks are encumbered with them, while these vessels should be on service abroad, and leave more space for those frames that we are now preparing to put up.

I trust, therefore, that while the House, cheerfully I am sure it will, will pass this bill for the construction of six ships, it will be equally willing to prepare those which we have already partially constructed, and repair those which we now have lying in the docks, for the service which the country demands of them. If there be any use for a Navy, any use for ships, I hope the House will agree to this proposition, that we may be always prepared for any emergency. It appears to me that we can see in advance an emergency which requires these vessels. I need not say to this House what is understood by the whole country, that all emergencies are lessened by previous preparation. It is more than probable that if we show ourselves prepared for any exigency which may happen, we may be spared a large expenditure of treasure and blood by this small expenditure.

It is best for us, therefore, to be prepared for any evil, and any events which may occur. Though I see no very great cloud, yet we all know that in the horizon, a cloud no larger than a man's hand may soon expand into the means of terrible storm; and it is best to be prepared for such an event, lest we be caught in the tempest.

I trust, therefore, the House will not find it unreasonable to adopt this proposition.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall oppose the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER,] in order to enable me to say a word or two by way of explanation.

If this proposition which I have offered be adopted, and the Secretary of the Navy shall find it necessary to use some portion of this three million fund within the next three or four months, it will be very easy to supply the deficiency in the regular naval bill, when it comes up. It is very certain that the whole amount of the three millions of dollars will not be needed within the next six months, for the construction of these six steamers.

It is further very questionable whether these steamers can be built under eighteen months or two years. We have, however, several ships now lying in our various ports, which can be fitted out ready for sea in a very few weeks, perhaps in a few days. If there is to be a general war in Europe, it may turn out that one or the other of these belligerents may pursue such a course as to render it necessary that we should have a greater naval force upon the ocean than we now have.

I was about to call the attention of the committee to another fact in support of the proposition which I have submitted. I refer to an article which I have recently seen, published in one of the English newspapers, in which it was stated, in reference to the attempt of this Government to get vessels to send to the relief of the San Francisco, that the United States had no Navy.

I also saw, not long since, in a Spanish paper, published at Madrid, an article showing the comparative strength of the American and Spanish Navies, in which it was stated that it appeared that Spain had a much larger Navy than the United States, and that they had nothing to fear from us.

I concur in the opinion expressed by the gentleman upon my right [Mr. CHANDLER] that by making a small show of naval force, we should be likely to escape great difficulty; hence I wish to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy a small sum of money for that purpose. My friend over the way, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKOCK,] stated yesterday that the reason why the Secretary of the Navy could not now use these ships, was, that the Committee of Ways and Means would not give him the money. My amendment will obviate that difficulty, and enable him to use a small portion of this fund for the repair of these vessels, if he shall deem it necessary.

As to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I do not care whether it be adopted or not. I shall vote for it, however.

The question recurring upon the amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER to the amendment, it was put; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] by adding:

Provided, That no more than one dollar shall be so used.

Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition appropriating money for the building of ships, and any question in reference to the appropriation of money for the payment of wages to seamen belongs to a different subject, and should be put in a different bill. When the proposition was made for building these ships, the question was raised before our committee, and before the Department, as to what amount of money was necessary for their construction.

Estimates were made, and it was agreed that about $6,000,000 would be necessary for the purchase of constructing six first-class frigates. It was also agreed that about two years would be necessary to complete them; we therefore thought that $3,000,000 could be properly expended during the present year, and we accordingly placed that amount in the bill.

Now, sir, I ask that the bill may be allowed to stand upon its own merits. I want the appropriations which we propose to make for the purpose of building ships to be applied exclusively for that purpose. If you apply a portion of the appropriation to the payment of seamen, in a short time you will have the Secretary of the Navy coming here and asking us to supply the deficiency which will thus be created. Gentlemen will then ask us why we did not make the appropriation large enough to build the ships?

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I ask if the gentleman from Virginia is discussing his amendment?

Several MEMBERS. You are only wasting time by raising questions of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. It may be that it is only wasting time; but I nevertheless make the question of order, and ask the Chair to decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman was proceeding strictly in order.

Mr. BOCKOCK. A gentleman near me asks if the estimate of $6,000,000 is not larger than that made by the Secretary of the Navy for the construction of these ships? The estimate of the Secretary was for $5,000,000; but he also sent in an estimate of the cost of finishing and fitting out certain other vessels; and, as it will be seen by the second section of this bill, we have made provision for finishing and fitting out the sail frigates Sabine and Santee, now on the stocks, the expense of which is to be included in this appropriation.

But, sir, I was about to say, when interrupted by the gentleman from Alabama, that this matter of paying seamen is not one requiring further legislation. The Secretary of the Navy now has ample power over the subject. All that is needed is an appropriation, and the proper place for that is in the naval appropriation bill, which I hope will come up before the committee in the course of a few weeks. Let gentlemen contest this question upon that bill, and not attempt to ingraft upon a bill for the construction and finishing of vessels a provision in relation to the payment of seamen's wages.

Mr. BOCKOCK then, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. COBB. I wish to put this bill in a condition in which I can vote for it. I believe the amendment I have to offer is a proper one, and I hope the gentleman from Virginia will accept it, and thus save the time of the committee. I offer the following as an amendment to the bill:

Provided further, That said propellers shall be manned by seamen now employed in the naval service; and should said equipping or manning disman vessels now in use, said vessels shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Navy upon such terms as in his judgment may be best, and the proceeds thereof be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, subject to such laws and regulations as may be now in force in other cases of deposits.

Perhaps the object of that amendment may not strike others as favorably as it does me. But if we are to construct new vessels, it is important that we should construct such as may be usefully employed by the Government. I believe the six steamers proposed to be constructed are such.

I have been in favor of the provisions of the bill in reference to the building of vessels for several years past. I am of opinion that many of our vessels are entirely worthless. My amendment is that we shall abandon the old hulks which have been floating about on the sea, much to the detriment of the individuals on board, as well as to our national enterprise on the ocean. It provides that we shall take the men from those useless vessels which have been floating—not floating very much, for I understand that the chains of most of their anchors have been rusting from inactivity—and put them aboard of these six steamers. By thus doing, and enabling the steamers to have active service, we contribute much to humanity; for the health of the men will be much improved by such a change. Put them on good vessels, and employ them actively, and they will have good health, and be useful in any emergency. That is the object I have in view. I will not argue a question which is so apparently right.

A MEMBER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. COBB. I am not through. I am like the Mississippi captain; I have a stoppage in my ideas, and have to wait before going on. [Laughter.] I think the amendment so obviously right that no gentleman should object to it. I am satisfied that if the proposition were made, disconnected from the present bill, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs would yield it his sanction. He is opposed to it, fearing that it will embarrass his measure. I want to vote for his bill; but I would much rather vote for it with the amendment I have suggested than without it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, for the reason that I consider it entirely impracticable. My opinion is to some extent based on the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which happens to be before me by accident. The report says that—"The American Navy consists of about seventy vessels, embracing all, from the ships-of-the-line to the smallest brig, schooner, and store-ship. Of these, many ships of-the-line, frigates, steamers, and sloops-of-war, are not only unfit for service, but I am advised by the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair, are not worth repairing. There are not now in the Navy forty vessels which could be brought into service in ninety days, if needed. There is no steamer in the Pacific or African squadron, but one of two guns in the Brazilian squadron, and we have no steamer of more than ten guns. The law only authorizes the enlistment of seven thousand five hundred men, which, with an allowance of a proper complement for each vessel, would not man a fleet of fifty vessels, with a fair proportion of large ships. On referring to authentic papers, it will be found that, in point of size at least, our Navy is much less than one fifth of that of several of the greater Powers of Europe, and, whatever may be its relative superiority and efficiency, is not larger than that of certain other Powers of Europe which are not of the first rank in the scale of nations."

I am opposed to the amendment, Mr. Chairman, because there are no vessels which could be sold, not having enough for the wants of the service; and further, for the reason that, as there are none of them good for anything which can be spared, surely nobody will be foolhardy enough to enter into a bad speculation by buying a rotten and worn-out ship or other vessel-of-war.

In the next place, I am opposed to it because it embarrasses this bill. While I desire the increase of the Navy as much as any gentleman, while I do not believe the force we have at present is sufficiently large, still I deem it my duty, having consented to the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to oppose all amendments by reasonable argument which may imperil the passage of the bill under consideration. I ardently desire it may, as I believe it will, become a law.

Could I have my wishes gratified by this House, and had it met the approbation of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill would have provided for building twelve first-class steam-frigates instead of the number now recommended to be built. The protection of our commerce, in my judgment, requires that such an addition should be made to our naval forces.

Several of the propositions which have been made during this debate may be referred to as fully as the time allotted to me will permit. I do not favor certain words in the bill. I consented to the addition, but I acknowledge that I was willing to leave the building of these ships entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. I have great confidence in his judgment. I refer to the words "to be built by contract, or in the Government navy-yards, as the Secretary of the Navy may think most advisable for the public interest." I am opposed entirely to the contract system for any of the supplies needed by the Government; and I have said so more than once upon this floor. The experience of the past, Mr. Chairman, fully justifies me in doing so. In nothing are we more forcibly impressed with the bad results of the contract system than in the building of ships, or vessels-of-war.

There are certain portions of the frame of a ship which cannot be replaced, except at very great expense; indeed, all repairs of the frame are very costly. It is therefore quite as essential to use good materials for this fundamental part of the structure as it is to use good materials in the foundation of a house.

All the experiments made in building ships of cheap materials, and by contract, have failed, as the statement I am about to make must convince the most skeptical.

The frigate Guerriere, built at Philadelphia, of white-oak, was broken up, as unworthy of repairs, after performing two short cruises. The frigate Java, built at Baltimore, by contract, made but one short cruise to the Mediterranean, and was found to be so weak that she was recalled. She afterwards received very extensive repairs, and made another cruise to the same station. On her return she was condemned as utterly unworthy of further repairs.

The frigate Hudson was built at New York for the Greek Government, by contract, and of white-oak. She was purchased into our Navy, and made but one short cruise, when she was found to be completely decayed, and was condemned.

The brig Lawrence was built, by contract, for the Navy, at Baltimore, at a cost of $45,000. She was found to be so dull a sailer, and drew so much water, that she was unfit for a vessel-of-war. At the expiration of her first and only cruise, she was found to be completely decayed, and was condemned.

The brig Perry, about eighty tons smaller than the Lawrence, was built about the same time, at the navy-yard at Norfolk, at a cost of $39,000, and is now attached to the African squadron, and likely to be a good vessel for years to come.

The Alleghany iron steamer was built at Pittsburgh, and proved so weak that several of her timbers were broken upon her first cruise. Her first cruise proved her a failure, so far as the mode of propulsion was concerned, and new engines were put into her at a very heavy expense. She again failed, and entirely in consequence of the weakness of the hull.

During the last war a private ship-builder was employed to put up the frame of the Washington at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and he spoiled one entire frame. This builder was very skillful in the construction of merchant ships, but frankly acknowledged that he was out of his depth in attempting a ship-of-war.

The advocates for building ships by private contract cannot name a single ship-of-war which has been creditable to the private builder.

The steamer Kamschatka, built for the Russian Government, was pronounced a disgrace to American mechanics.

The steamer United States, which was sold to the German Government, was found to be unfit for a vessel-of-war; and the small steamers built for the Mexican Navy, but purchased upon an emergency into our own, were utter failures.

Our navy-yards are provided with a very large stock of live-oak, amounting to several millions of cubic feet, which is of the very best description, altogether beyond the reach of private builders; also scantling of the very best description, as well as all the materials for building ships, calculated to last half a century. They are also provided with ship-houses, erected over building ships for the convenience of workmen, and the preservation of ships while in construction; and lastly, we have experience and skill in our naval constructors in building vessels-of-war, which cannot be found out of our Government establishments.

Finer ships or better models have never been produced than the ships which now compose our Navy, especially on steamers. The only thing about the steamers which has failed is the steam machinery, and that was all built by contract.

The law of contract is imperative that work must be done by the lowest bidder, which is a premium for bad work; for contractors certainly do not intend to lose money by their operations; on the contrary, they intend to make as much as they can; and yet the attempt has been made to hold the Bureau of the Navy Department responsible for this defective law and the dishonesty of contractors.

The great defect of our naval establishments is the want of workshops for steam machinery, and that should be remedied as early as possible.

The English Government has been compelled at times to resort to the contract system, and the result has always been a most prodigal and useless expenditure of money. At one time fifty new frigates were struck off the Navy list as being unfit for vessels-of-war, and they were all built by contract; and in war steamers the number of failures in England has been immense. English officers, of the highest distinction, concede that the United States Navy is equally complete, so far as it goes, with their own, but they deny this of any other.

The frigate Congress and sloop St. Marys were visited, in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, in December, 1850, by Vice Admiral Mosely, of the British Navy, now in command of the squadron in the Pacific ocean. On leaving the Congress, he declared that he had that day inspected the finest and best-appointed frigate he had ever seen. Another instance was related to me to-day. At Canton, in China, the commander of the British East India squadron has highly lauded the razez Macedonian, admiring her proportions, and speaking favorably of her armament and officering for active war service.

The cost of labor upon a ship-of-war is about fifty-five per cent. of her entire cost. It will readily be seen that it is for the interest of the Government to employ this very costly labor upon the best materials, as it costs as much to build a ship of bad material as of good. Live-oak lasts twice as long, at least, as white-oak, and the cost of white-oak is from one half to two thirds that of live-oak.

The total cost of the steamer Susquehanna, completely ready for sea, with stores for three years, and a full supply of coals, was $759,454 42. Her frame contains twenty-three thousand one hundred and sixty-three cubic feet of live-oak, which cost $36,138 89, being but a very small proportion of the entire cost of the ship. A white-oak frame would have cost about $18,500; and thus a saving in the first cost of the ship of about $18,000 only would have been made had that material been used; but the ship would have decayed in half the time, and, in fact, been worth about half as much.

Merchant vessels are broken out and restored every voyage; and as often as this is done, they are thoroughly dried and ventilated. A vessel-of-war, on the contrary, frequently runs for two or perhaps three years without having her hold broken out. For this reason ships-of-war are much more subjected to decay than merchant vessels, which renders it very essential to use the very best materials in the construction of the former. The English and French Navy Departments have tested the experiment, and abandoned the contract system, because in no instance did they secure efficient vessels under that system; and every such attempt that has been made by the Government of the United States, as I think I have fully shown, has resulted in the construction of vessels that have not been adapted for the purposes of war.

Yesterday my colleague [Mr. Grow] referred to the fact, and urged it as a reason why this bill should not be passed, that the contracts entered into with the Collins and other lines of steamers provide us with a sufficient floating force, without the increase of the Navy now proposed. I take exception to that position, for the reason that we have now upon our tables a report from a commission, appointed under a resolution offered by a gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALKER,] which proves conclusively that those vessels are not adapted for war purposes. The experience of the British Admiralty, coming contemporaneously with the report made by the commission that entered into the examination, brings us the intelligence, and their decision, that even the celebrated Cunard steamers, with all their efficiency for sea service, are fitted only for transports, and are not suited for war purposes.

I am opposed to that provision of the bill which permits the Secretary of the Navy even to have a discretion as to giving out the building of these vessels by contract; and I am not selfish in that; for it is not that I have not the most unlimited confidence in the intelligence and judgment of that gentleman and efficient officer, but that I conceive it to be our duty to have them properly constructed, which, in my humble judgment, can only be done in our navy-yards, for the reasons I have given.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman is not saying a word about my amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, sir, I will. Permit me to say that I am entirely opposed to the gentleman's amendment, for the reason that it is impracticable.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. CLINGMAN's amendment.

Mr. MATTESON. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. BOCKOCK. There is an amendment already pending. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will not, therefore, be in order, except as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. There is an amendment pending. Does the gentleman from New York propose to offer an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. MATTESON. No, sir; it is a substantive amendment, and I will reserve it until the pending question is disposed of.

The question was then put on Mr. CLINGMAN's amendment, and the Chair announced that it was lost.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for a division, and I ask that my amendment may again be read.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I asked for a division in time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so decides.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, by inserting after the words "authorized to pay" the words "not to exceed the amount now paid seamen in the merchant service of the country."

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the remarks which have been made upon this bill by the gentleman from Virginia, who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as it involves only $3,000,000, and as many of us are inclined to aid in its passage, I, for one, want to vote on it quickly.

I desire, however, to say a very few words in reference to the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, for I think there is more in it than some of us are aware of. My little experience in this House has led me to believe, that one of the great causes of what is said to be the inefficiency of the American Navy is, that we do not pay the seamen employed in the naval service of the United States sufficient to obtain the men necessary to man our naval ships.

I recollect very well that a few months ago, when the President of the United States was about to send the expedition to Japan, Commodore Perry was in this city, representing to members of Congress the utter impossibility of manning the ships placed under his command, for the very reason that the men required to fill the places of sailors were not to be paid more than half as much as sailors were in the habit of receiving in the merchant marine. I wish to see this state of things changed. Although I believe the reasons urged by my friend from Virginia [Mr. BOCKOCK] this morning are strong, yet I desire to insert the amendment I have suggested, believing that it cannot work any injury to the bill. Why should not the seamen employed in the military marine of the United States receive as much pay as those employed in the mercantile marine, when it is known that they are required to sail to ports in Europe and all parts of the world. I think we ought to do this. I would give the Secretary of the Navy the power to regulate the compensation of the sailors, and limit it to the amount now paid in the mercantile marine service of the country. I am friendly to the American Navy, and I wish to see its capacity improved, and have it restored to its former glory. I wish to see it regenerated—I wish to have it reinvigorated by a proper spirit of progress and reform, not only in the construction of the ships, but in the personnel of the Navy. I wish to see a modification of the whole naval establishment—the creation of a retired list, by which our naval officers, worn out in the service, may be placed upon a footing with those of other nations of the world; that the young and aspiring officers might be advanced to positions whereby they could contribute to the maintenance of the honor and glory of the American flag abroad. I would have such a reform in the service as would strengthen the young officers of the Navy. I would increase their service and their responsibility, and thus reform, regenerate, and build up a glorious Navy—thus make it what it has been, the admiration of the world. I would put it in the power of the Secretary of the Navy now, and not at the end of the year when these ships are built, to have ready at a moment's warning the necessary force to man your Navy, if necessary in thirty days. Give him the power in regard to pay, but limit it in such a way that he will not be required to pay more than is paid in the merchant service of the country. If you adopt such a policy, I believe, as past experience has shown, that you will obtain the requisite number of seamen to man your ships, and enable them to traverse the seas in all parts of the world.

Mr. CUMMING. I would say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] that I think he is in error in regard to this matter. At this time, the President is by law authorized to make the pay of sailors whatever he thinks proper; and no amendment of the kind suggested by the gentleman is necessary.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BOOCOCK] what amount the Secretary of the Navy is now authorized by law to pay for seamen?

Mr. BOOCOCK. There is no limit. I know that it is not under eighteen dollars per month. I have come to the conclusion, from conversation with gentlemen, and from the information I have gathered upon this subject, that there is no limit, except that made by the appropriation in this House.

Mr. CUMMING. I rose merely to say, that if gentlemen—as I am myself—are disposed to increase the efficiency of the Navy, there is one thing requisite, and that is, to make an appropriation large enough to allow the Secretary to make the wages of these seamen the same as those employed in the ordinary commercial marine.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMING] allow me one suggestion? I want the benefit of his opinion.

Mr. CUMMING. Certainly.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Under this proposed amendment the Secretary of the Navy may take a portion of the money and pay the seamen as he may deem necessary; and, therefore, three or four months hence, when this naval bill is passed, if there be any deficiency thereby caused, it can be supplied. The object is to get at this present appropriation in the deficiency bill. Will not that answer the purpose of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CUMMING. I think so. I have no objection to that at all. I prefer that, because as the matter stands now, if seamen are engaged at higher wages than those paid by the mercantile marine, there will be none of them left for our commerce, and I should rather have some left than none at all.

The question was then put on the amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. By the amendment, the amount to be paid to seamen is not to exceed the amount paid to sailors in the mercantile service of the country.

The question was then put; and the Chair announced that the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for a division.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I ask the committee to permit the amendment to be read again. I want to move an amendment to it.

The amendment was accordingly again reported. Mr. BOOCOCK. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that that amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. A division was called for in time, and the question has not been ultimately decided.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I want to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. That is still the pending amendment.

Mr. BAYLY. I move to strike out the first word in the amendment, desiring to say a word in reference to this matter.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is an unnecessary confusion among members on the subject of the pay of seamen. Now, there is no law whatever regulating the pay of seamen. The discretion of the President in the matter is limited in two ways. The law fixes the number of men to be employed in the Navy, and more than that number cannot be employed; and then the appropriation bill fixes the amount to be paid. Taking these two things together, they impose the limitation, and the only limitation whatever, in regard to the pay of seamen.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Virginia is mistaken about this matter, for this question was up at the last session. By referring to the law on the subject, the gentleman will find that the President of the United States, through the Secretary of the Navy, has the right to apportion the wages to seamen. That I understand to be the law regulating the matter.

Mr. BAYLY. I do not deny that at all. That is precisely what I understand about it.

A MEMBER. That is what the gentleman from Virginia has said.

Mr. HOUSTON. No; he says that the appropriation bill fixes the wages to be paid.

Mr. BAYLY. You take the two points together, and that fixes the result. The one is a question of limitation of numbers, and the other is an appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the President has the authority under the law to say that a seaman shall have fifteen dollars per month, and we appropriate only twelve dollars per month, as a matter of course that does not deprive the seaman of the other three dollars, if the President says he shall have it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. BAYLY; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. CLINGMAN—

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, said: Is it too late, Mr. Chairman, to raise a question of order in reference to that amendment, and that is, that it is not germane to the bill? The wages of seamen has nothing to do with the building of these ships, and therefore the amendment is not in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. According to an admission which has been made here, this amendment does not affect the rate of wages, but merely allows the President to use a portion of the funds.

Mr. STANTON. I insist upon it that the amendment is not in order. This bill is for building certain vessels, and an amendment to the effect that a portion of it should be expended for another purpose, is certainly out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The amendment is to fit up vessels already built, and therefore it is germane.

Mr. STANTON. I will remind the Chair, if he will allow me, that there is always an appropriation in the general appropriation bill for repairs, sometimes called "for an increase and repairs;" and for that reason the amendment is inappropriate here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entertains the opinion that the amendment is not in order. It has reference purely to the rate of pay to seamen, while the bill refers purely to the construction of these six frigates. For this reason the Chair holds the point of order to be well taken, and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I submit to the Chair another suggestion, and that is, whether it is not too late to take this exception now, after it has been entertained by the committee for two days, and various amendments to it have been voted upon. I suggest that the amendment has been entertained by the general consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entertains the opinion that a question of order may be raised at any time. The Chair rules the amendment out of order. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will not appeal.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the first section of the bill:

Provided, That no intoxicating liquors shall ever be kept in said ships for a beverage.

Mr. DEAN. I raise a question of order upon that amendment. An amendment as to what the seamen shall eat or drink is not germane to the bill.

Mr. PECKHAM. Liquor is germane, of course. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is raised as to whether the amendment is in order or not. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order, inasmuch as the first section of the bill has relation to the construction of these frigates, and not as to the mode and manner of using them. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMITH. Then I am constrained, though with pain to myself, to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

A MEMBER. It may be in order as an amendment to the other section of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Do I understand the Chair to decide that my amendment will be in order to another section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair expressed no opinion in reference to any other point of the bill. He decided that it was not in order at this point.

Mr. SMITH. If I can offer it at any other point I will withdraw my appeal, and also withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PECKHAM. I move to amend the first section of the bill, so as to provide for the construction of nine frigates instead of six.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If it is in order, I wish to renew in a modified form the amendment which was some time since ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has offered an amendment, and is entitled to the floor, if he desires to speak upon it.

Mr. PECKHAM. I offered this amendment in consequence of facts which have been received this morning in reference to the promulgation of an order, in council, by the foreign Secretary in England, in reference to the action of that Government as to the freight on goods in neutral vessels. I see it stated that "Some excitement had been created in commercial circles by Lord Clarendon's official announcement to the Riga merchants that all Russian produce, to whomsoever belonging, and even in neutral vessels, shall be lawful prizes in the event of war."

Upon that it seems some comment has been made by Mr. Gibson, a member of the House of Commons, a portion of which I beg leave to read:

"If the dispatch of Lord Clarendon was to be acted upon, we should assuredly be brought into collision with the Americans, whose merchantmen would be liable to be searched by the British cruisers, and, if they had any parcel on board which, directly or indirectly, could be made out to be connected with Russian commerce, to be condemned in some court of admiralty. He had hoped that the sounder and safer policy that 'free ships make free ports' would have saved us from the risk of collision with friendly Powers. [Hear, hear, &c.]"

Now, sir, this is a revival, or rather, perhaps, I should say, a continuance—for I am not aware that it has ever been abandoned by the British Government—of the right of search in reference to our vessels; but a doctrine to which we have never acceded, and to which I never can accede. It is a question of very great importance to this Government; for our commerce with Russia is very large; and hence the question comes directly home to us. This war is imminent; indeed, it already exists; and a proclamation of this sort made by the Government of Great Britain cannot be received by us with indifference.

Then, sir, I ask, if this is to be their course towards us, if it is not an important reason, if it should not be a controlling reason, for the prompt and efficient action of this House, that while we are adding to our Navy, we should add a little more? I am in favor of this increase. If the wants of the country before required the construction of six frigates, it seems to me that the fact I have stated should have a sufficient bearing here to induce the House to increase the number to nine at least.

Great Britain, it is true, asks our sympathy in her contest with Russia, and she may receive it. In all probability she already has it to a great degree in this House at the present time; but it is all important that she should understand most distinctly that she is encroaching upon a doctrine which we hold to be of most vital importance; and we should be in a condition not only to proclaim this doctrine, but to have it respected. It is much better for this country to prevent aggression than to seek redress after the wrong has been inflicted. I hope and trust, without extending comments on the subject, that this matter will be properly considered by the committee; and this is the proper occasion, not only to call the attention of the committee to the subject, but to have it understood by Great Britain what our view is on the question.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, the committee have exhibited a very evident disinclination to adopt any amendments to the bill, doubtless from a wish to protect it from material alteration. I hoped that we should have remained in session yesterday until the bill was finally passed; and I trust we may be soon allowed to take a vote upon it. Believing it to be a measure urgently demanded by the necessities of the country, I should like to see it pass without delay; and as I think that, in the form in which it came from the Committee on Naval Affairs, it is more likely to be acceptable to the majority, I am willing to take it without change. Any material alterations might endanger its success.

The bill in its present form is simply intended to provide an addition to the peace establishment of the country. The amendment of the gentleman from New York looks to a state of war with other Powers, which he considers not improbable. I would suggest that, if hereafter we should find the aspect of political affairs such as to require us to make more extensive warlike preparations, a supplemental bill may be introduced at some future period of the session to provide for any existing emergency; but let us not change the character of the present bill, which is only designed to make necessary additions to our peace establishment. I doubt, too, if more than six of these propellers could be advantageously built at one time.

If I thought it prudent to encourage amendments, there are some which I would myself suggest to the bill. I should prefer, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] to strike out so much of it as gives discretion to the Department to provide for the building of any of these ships by contract. To this mode of building them I should be utterly opposed. I cannot, of course, in the few minutes allowed me, enforce my objections to the contract system for work of this kind. Other gentlemen, however, entertain different views; and it was therefore well enough, perhaps, not to prescribe any particular manner of building them, but to leave the Secretary to determine this question. It is a matter of administration, and it strictly belongs to the Department. I have full confidence in the Secretary of the Navy, and I believe he will come to a proper determination upon it. The condition of the country requires the passage of such a bill as this. I believe that it is demanded by an almost unanimous public sentiment. In no other way can we more advantageously dispose of a portion of the large surplus now in the Treasury.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] spoke yesterday in opposition to this bill. The sentiments he uttered may be, abstractly, very proper, but I do not think they apply to the measure now under consideration. These frigates are not to be built with reference to aggressive operations. Even with this addition to our Navy, it will remain comparatively a small one. We want six more steamers for purposes of ordinary accommodation and defense. The honorable gentleman said that our ships had heretofore only been built to rot. That, sir, is certainly true. All the works of man are perishable. But, so far from being an objection, I submit that it is cause for congratulation that we have had little occasion for the services of these ships in war. Who can tell how far the possession of these ships may have saved us from war, and secured that very peace which is so desirable? As well might we repeal the law prohibiting and punishing the crime of murder because since its passage there had been no violation of its provisions, as to suffer the Navy to go down because our ships of war have only been built to rot.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was lost.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I renew, Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have already offered in substance. I have varied it so that I hope it will, in the judgment of the Chair, be admissible. I propose that it shall come in at the end of the first section. It is as follows:

And no intoxicating liquor shall ever be kept in said ships for a beverage.

Mr. DEAN. I again make a point of order on that amendment. I do not like to do it; but if all sorts of amendments are allowed to be offered and debated, we shall never dispose of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. DEAN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. DEAN. Why, that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. COBB. The object of the bill is to authorize the construction of ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, on the right of the Chair, offers the amendment which has been read. His colleague, on the left of the Chair, makes the point of order that the amendment is not in order. The Chair sustains the point of order, and from that decision an appeal is taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. Will the Chairman be so good as to state the ground upon which he rules the amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps it is unnecessary to state it; but the Chair can see no reason why the amendment can come within the purview of the bill, unless the article to which it relates is to be regarded as part of the armament and equipment of a vessel.

The question was then taken on the appeal, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained, and the amendment ruled out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now offer an amendment modified so as, I hope, to meet the views of the Chair as to the point of order.

The Clerk reported the amendment as follows:

Provided, That in the mean time, to enable the Secretary of the Navy to fit up for use vessels already built, he is authorized to use such portion of the appropriation made in this bill as may be necessary.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The ships provided for in this bill will not be ready for use for perhaps two years. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKOCK,] chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, suggests that a proposition such as mine may very well come in in the Navy appropriation bill. My friend's parliamentary experience will suggest to him that that bill will probably not become a law until the last day of the session. That last day may, as was the case two years ago, be the last of August; or it may, as was the case four years ago, be the last of September; or it may even be in October. In the mean time, in the next five or six months, why should not the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to put in use some one of the five or six ships which are now lying idle in our dock-yards? There is the Vermont, an eighty-four gun ship, at Boston, which I learn could be got ready for sea in three or four weeks, if there was a little money.

Now, suppose such a difficulty as is suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] occurs, and that our merchant vessels are seized, upon the allegation that they contain some Russian property, and we want, in the next five or six months, some force on the ocean, is it not far better that the Secretary of the Navy shall be able to meet the emergency then, than that we shall wait two years until the steamers are built; or, at any rate, until the passage of the Navy appropriation bill, some time in the fall? I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, obtained the floor.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I want just to ask the gentleman from North Carolina one question.

Mr. JONES. I desire to submit a question of order.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Let me ask my question first.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, if the Secretary of the Navy has informed the House in any way, that the amount contained in the last appropriation bill for the repairs of vessels, is insufficient? He has certainly given no such information to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am extremely averse to speaking of matters that have not been communicated officially, and I will not do it now. But I think that this proposition is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee submit a question of order?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir, I do. I submit the question of order whether, this being a bill to authorize the construction of six steam frigates, an amendment is in order to set apart a portion of the sum proposed to be appropriated for the fitting up of vessels already constructed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that the point of order is not well taken. The second section of the bill provides for other vessels besides these steamers.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It may be supposed that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina, is a very proper one. If there should be any deficiency in the appropriation for repairs of vessels, it might well be supplied. If there is no necessity for so using the money, of course it would go for the objects of the bill.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HENN. I offer the following amendment: Provided, That one of said vessels shall be built at each of the following places, to wit:

Kittery, in the State of Maine; New York, in the State of New York; Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania; Memphis, in the State of Tennessee; Charleston, in the State of Massachusetts; and one at such point on the lakes as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

I can look upon this bill in no other light than as a distribution of $3,000,000 of the public money; and if there is to be such a distribution, I hope that it may be extended all over the United States, and not be confined to one or two places—Norfolk, in Virginia, and—

Mr. BOCKOCK. I should like to have the gentleman tell us how this distribution of money is to be made at Norfolk?

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do not know that there is anything in the bill like making an appropriation for Norfolk, Virginia.

Mr. COBB. Have you got a navy-yard there?

Mr. BAYLY. We have got a navy-yard there. I undertake to say, from pretty accurate knowledge upon the subject, that vessels are built cheaper at Norfolk than anywhere else in the country. In this connection, I desire to say a word about this building of ships by contract. All our vessels are built by contract, and there is nothing about them which is not done by contract, even down to the wages of men who are employed.

The question was then taken on Mr. HENN's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out all in the first section after the word "service," in the eighth line, and insert the following:

That one or more of said vessels and machinery shall be built by contract with three separate individuals or firms, under such stipulations and restrictions as the Secretary of the Navy may deem best calculated to subserve the public interests, and the residue in the Government navy-yards.

I do not know, but it may be regarded as a piece of unpardonable presumption in any one who shall undertake to amend this bill in any manner. From the promptness with which the members of this committee, and particularly my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. BOCKOCK,] have objected to every amendment that has been offered, it would seem that we are speaking to a foregone conclusion on this subject.

I have heard, Mr. Chairman, of the perfection of the ten commandments; I have heard of the perfection of the five orders of architecture; I have heard of the perfection of the Apollo Belvidere; I have heard of perfection in many other ways; but never till now have I heard of anything like perfection in a bill. This bill, sir, before the committee is very brief; and from the manner in which it is drawn up, it is evident that the question was discussed before the Committee on Naval Affairs as to whether a portion of these vessels should be given out to private contract, and the balance of them built in the public navy-yards. It is evident that this question was discussed in the committee, in accordance with the well-known public sentiment that exists outside of this House. And, Mr. Chairman, if any such intention was really entertained by the committee, I can see no objection in instructing, by a vote of this House, the Secretary of the Navy that one, at least, of these ships shall be built by private contract.

Sir, I, for one, will not enter into any sweeping and wholesale denunciation of what has been termed the "Old Fogysm" of the Navy. I presume we will all be old, one of these days; and if, when we do become aged, we can look back with the same pride on our public life which many of those who are now called "Old Fogies," whether in the Army or Navy of the country, or in the councils of the nation, can, we will leave no regrets for our children. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a pride of profession which exists particularly among old soldiers and old sailors. There is a pride of profession known among lawyers, physicians, and almost all men belonging to exclusive professions, which makes them cling "with pertinacious pertinacity" to the past, and look with a great deal of caution, if not with absolute abhorrence, on everything in the shape of innovation.

Sir, there is no gentleman within the range of my voice that has not heard with pride and gratification the history of the triumphs achieved by our mail steamers on the ocean. There is not a man or boy from one end of this land to the other whose heart did not palpitate with joy when he heard that the work of a young man of genius, an humble mechanic, unaided, had overshadowed and sunk into nothingness everything in the shape of competition, by the triumph of the yacht America in Europe.

Sir, it is absolutely necessary, in my opinion, that some of these vessels should be built by contract with private individuals. I am in favor of the passage of this bill; but I trust that the committee will at least offer no objection to the amendment I have introduced. I have full confidence in the ability of the Secretary of the Navy. I have full confidence in his honor and integrity. And I know that if he is instructed by a vote of this House to give one of these vessels out to private contract he will have no difficulty in carrying out what he is directed, and selecting a proper man for the work. And I have no hesitation in believing that that man—if there is to be but one of them—will be George Steers, the builder of the yacht America—a man whom I feel personally interested in. I am free to admit that I have been written to by numbers of young mechanics, urging that the genius of American mechanics shall be vindicated in the person of that man who might be fitly termed the Napoleon of American naval architecture.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The point made by the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat, [Mr. WALSH], is really one in which I feel a great deal of interest, and that is, the idea of building these naval vessels by contract. As I stated a few moments ago, they are now built by contract. There is not an article which enters into their construction which is not bought by contract. The only question is, whether you will contract for the entire construction as such, or for certain specified portions. That is all. The point made by the gentleman from New York is in relation to the character of the naval construction. The point of difficulty which he makes does not at all grow out of the fact that these vessels are built by the Government, but out of the fact that the naval contractors are not as skillful as some unknown mechanics. Now, I am in favor of employing those first-rate architects in the navy-yards, and I am opposed to the system of letting out the building of national vessels to private ship-yards, for such a course has hitherto proved an utter failure. There has not been a single case in which a ship has been built by contract, and very few, if any, cases where they have been bought in open market, which have not proved to be failures.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me a single remark?

Mr. BAYLY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. They have proved failures for the very reason that they have not been given to men who had established a reputation in the business, but have been given to men who have violated every solitary provision of the contract.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman could not have supplied me with a more conclusive argument against his proposition than the one he has just advanced. We all know the difficulties of carrying out these Government contracts. It is almost impossible to avoid departures from the precise terms of a contract. And therein lies my objection to them. If any gentleman will point to me a case where the Government, in undertaking to do anything in this way, has not been the loser, I will surrender the point.

The question recurring upon the amendment offered by Mr. WALSH, it was put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MATTESON. I move to strike out of the first section the words, "said vessels and machinery to be built by contract, or in the Government navy-yards, as the Secretary of the Navy may think most advisable for the public interest," and to insert in lieu thereof the amendment which I send to the Chair, as separate sections.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a point of order. We have passed from the first section, and the amendment is therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is still considering the first section, and the amendment is in order at this point.

The amendment offered by Mr. MATTESON was then read in part, but the reading was arrested upon a point of order. The amendment was accordingly withdrawn, but was subsequently offered again, and will be found on page 832.

Mr. ORR. I move to strike out of the eighth line of the first section the words, "by contract, or," and in the ninth and tenth lines the words, "as the Secretary of the Navy may think most advisable for the public interest;" so that the section would then read:

"That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constructed for the United States Navy, at as early a day as practicable, consistently with a due regard for economy and efficiency, six first class steam frigates, to be provided with screw propellers, and properly armed and equipped for service; said vessels and machinery to be built in the Government navy-yards."

I move this amendment for the purpose of requiring these Government vessels to be built at the proper place—at the Government navy-yards. We have erected these yards, and fitted them up with every convenience for ship building. They are now in a condition to proceed with the work. They have large supplies of timber already on hand, and there will be none of the inconvenience or delay which will result from authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to build them by contract.

I have, however, another view of this matter, which I regard as more important even than that I have named. I think every one acquainted with the facts will agree with me that the experience of this Government proves most conclusively that those vessels which have been built in our navy-yards have proved much more durable, much more substantial and sea-worthy, than those constructed by private contract.

I do not concur in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] in reference to this matter; but I do concur most fully in the opinions expressed by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY], when he last addressed the committee, as to the inefficiency of vessels built for the Government by private contractors. But I must confess, that when he made his first remarks I understood him altogether differently. I understood him then to say that vessels built by contract were the most durable and substantial. There are some portion of these vessels which may very well be built by contract. The machinery may very well be supplied in that manner.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will say, that when I referred to building vessels by contract, I did not use the word in the sense which this bill contemplates. But while the vessels are constructed at the navy-yards, the materials may be furnished by contract.

Mr. ORR. I understand the gentleman now, and I am very glad I gave him an opportunity of setting himself right.

Mr. CUMMING. I will say to the gentleman, that one of the principal materials in ship building is live-oak, which the Government never purchases.

Mr. ORR. Well, sir, there is a large supply of live-oak now on hand at the different navy-yards. I know that to be the fact in reference to that at Boston, and I think the same is true of that at Washington; and my impression is that there is a pretty large supply at all of them.

Mr. BAYLY. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I desire to say a word in reply to a remark just made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUMMING], to the effect that the Government never purchases its live-oak. I am very well aware of that fact, but it has to be got, and the getting is done by contract.

Mr. ORR. We have had several vessels built by private contract, and the result has been that they have proved not so good, not so substantial and durable as those built by your naval constructors; and in the end they cost the Government more. The universal experience of the Government has been, that whenever its work has been done by contract, it has cost more in the end, besides having the work badly done. Gentlemen know what was the effect of having our printing done by contract in years gone by. And the same has been true in reference to every branch of the service. I repeat, sir, that the vessels which have been built by private contract are much less substantial, do not last so long, and do not serve our purpose so well, as those built by our naval constructors.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. I voted for that of my colleague which made it peremptory on the Secretary of the Navy to have at least one of these steamers built by contract; but I think that it is plainly evident there are no amendments to be adopted to the bill. As it is now it leaves the matter discretionary with the Secretary. That is a compromise. Those in favor of the contract system would like this better than that the matter should be stricken out entirely. Without consuming further the time of the committee I would express the hope that we may speedily vote on the amendments, rise, and report the bill to the House.

The question was put on the amendment; and, on a division, there were—ayes 32—

Tellers were demanded, but not ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was lost.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move the following amendment, as an addition to the first section:

Provided, That one million of the appropriation made in this bill may be used for the repairing or fitting out of any vessels already built.

Mr. Chairman, it is known to this committee that there are many persons disposed to try experiments with the vessels-of-war that we now have. England has done it extensively. She has fitted out some of her large vessels with the screw propeller, and it has been found to answer admirably. I wish this committee to bear that fact in mind. Well, we have ships now under shelter, or in ordinary. If they were fitted out with the screw propeller, we should have the steam portion of our Navy afloat at an early day; but it cannot be done except by a suitable appropriation. The object of the amendment to the bill which contemplates an increase of naval steamers, is to give the Secretary the power to at once try the experiments on existing ships. Now, I respectfully submit to the committee that it is a wise and judicious policy, and I hope that the modification will be accepted by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. BOGGS.]

Mr. Chairman, this is not all. There may be some occasion for the active operation of the improved vessels we contemplate. It may be necessary that we should have some of these vessels afloat at an early day; and we all know very well that these new steam frigates cannot be got afloat within two years. In the mean time, if emergencies arise, what is to become of us? If you adopt the amendment, the ships-of-the-line now in ordinary, the vessels now unfit for ocean service as vessels-of-war, can be made to the purpose indicated. Indeed, one of the ships-of-the-line is being cut down, and the experiment is to be tried on her out of the existing appropriations. Adopt the amendment, and we shall at once have this improved element in our Navy.

I hope the amendment will be adopted. I leave it to the committee. It cannot embarrass the bill. It will really promote its passage. It will give to the Secretary discretion which, under the circumstances, is necessary, and will add to the power of our Navy, as desired.

Mr. BOGGS. I am specifically appealed to by my colleague to accept his amendment, and it is for that reason, more than for the purpose of adding anything to what has already been said, that I now take the floor.

I cannot, for the life of me, see the propriety or necessity of this amendment. The gentlemen think they see it, I have no doubt; but what is the necessity of it?

The first proposition made in relation to this subject was to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to pay increased wages to seamen. I suggested that the proper place to do that would be in the Navy appropriation bill. Now, the proposition, as I understand it, means the same thing, but put in this form for the purpose of getting round the point of order.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BOGGS. Well, it proposes to take a portion of the money that this bill appropriates for the construction of new vessels, and give it to the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of repairing old vessels.

Mr. SMITH. I hope my colleague will not say that this is a proposition to give increased wages to seamen.

Mr. BOCOCK. I supposed it was.

Mr. SMITH. There is no such feature or idea contained in it.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then I was in error. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SMITH. It is a bona fide proposition.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then it is a bona fide proposition to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to take the money intended for the construction of these frigates, and use it to refit other vessels.

It will be remembered by those gentlemen who have been members of this House for any length of time, that in the annual Navy appropriation bill, there is always an item for repairs and reconstruction.

Now, who has said that the money thus appropriated is not sufficient? Who has been authorized to say upon this floor that the Secretary of the Navy has needed money for the repair of old vessels which has not been given to him by the legislation of Congress? Where is there any old vessel needing repair, and that could properly be repaired, which the Secretary of the Navy has not been able to have put in repair? Why bring the subject up in connection with this bill when we have no definite information that any such appropriation is needed? We have heard nothing at all of it. The Secretary of the Navy has not communicated it to the Committee on Naval Affairs. On the contrary, the Secretary of the Navy has told me—I dislike to state matters of conversation, but it tends to sustain the positions taken in his annual report—that there are a few old vessels that can never be repaired, or, at any rate, the repairing of which would cost more than the vessels would be worth when repaired, and he desired rather to get rid of some of them than to have them repaired. But I have never in any form heard a suggestion that there was any vessel which he wished to have repaired.

Mr. SMITH. I would suggest to my colleague that this amendment would not compel the Secretary of the Navy to use the money in this way. The purpose is to give him an opportunity of putting afloat a vessel of one hundred and sixty guns in case of need.

Mr. BOCOCK. He has not asked it.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMITH's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. WELLS. I move to amend the first section by striking out the word "six" and inserting "three" in lieu thereof, so as to make the number of frigates three instead of six. There is no necessity, judging from what I have heard in this committee, for building six steam frigates at this time.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I am under the impression that we have passed over that portion of the bill.

Mr. WELLS. No, sir; we have not done anything of the sort.

Mr. STANTON. My desire is simply to get this bill into the House, and to see it pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to aid the gentleman from Tennessee in forwarding the business in reference to the bill, but the Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is in order.

Mr. WELLS. I can see no necessity for the construction of six first-class steam frigates at this time. I offer this amendment with but little hope that it will be adopted; for it seems to be the opinion of this committee that we must have six frigates of the first class, no more and no less.

It is admitted by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by all the friends of the bill, that it will cost $6,000,000 to construct and arm these ships; and yet the bill only appropriates $3,000,000 for this object. Now, if the six steam frigates are to be constructed, I think the bill should contain an appropriation equal to the whole expenditure which their construction would require. It is admitted on all hands that we have now more ships-of-war than we can easily man. To build six more steamers, especially if after they were constructed it would be found difficult to man them, or they would not be required for actual service, would be, in my opinion, a mere waste of the public money. What use, I would ask, could we now make of six steamers, as provided in this bill, if they were already built? In what service could they now be employed? Does our commerce in any part of the world need the protection they would afford? Would it be good policy to accept, even as a gift, a score of such ships, if we were compelled to keep them manned and ready for service?

I am inclined to the opinion that we had better build but one vessel at first, as an experiment, as it might turn out to be a failure. If we go on and build six steamers, we may make six stupendous failures, as we have heretofore always done when we have undertaken enterprises of this kind, if we except the cases of the Missouri and the Mississippi. Of all the great ships that have been built heretofore, these two alone have been considered as successful; and one of these—the Missouri—was burned soon after it was put in commission. It seems to me it would be good economy for the Government to do as an individual would do under similar circumstances: to build a smaller number of vessels at first, and see how the experiment would work.

It is said that we ought to build these vessels in order to be prepared for any emergency that might arise in case of collision with other Powers. They are, then, not wanted if we continue at peace; and who does not know that the building of these steamers would be but the beginning of a great war establishment, when there is no necessity for, and no prospect of a war, if we continue to act upon those pacific and equitable principles which have always governed our intercourse with other nations.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] had read an extract from some paper to the effect that England, in case of war with Russia, intended to issue orders to search neutral vessels for articles of Russian produce. I do not think in the present state of affairs, and with the strong desire that England must naturally have to preserve amicable relations with this country, that there is any danger that she will be disposed to reaffirm the exploded doctrine of the right of search, or to take any course inconsistent with the established principles of international law, or which would have a tendency to endanger the harmony and good feeling now existing between the two countries.

Let me say, sir, that our strength at home and our credit abroad do not depend upon these war frigates. The four Collins steamers at this time do more to sustain our credit, and carry the impression of our power abroad, than all the Navy we have built since 1815. Their equals do not float upon the ocean, and they evince that in peaceful commerce at least England is no longer mistress of the sea. Our merchant ships, too, unsurpassed as they are in magnificence and speed, which have introduced a new era in naval architecture, and whose canvas whitens every sea, are making our power felt, and giving us importance in every quarter of the globe; and, in the pursuits of peace, are doing more to secure our progress in all that concerns the true glory and welfare of a State, than could be effected by all the armaments and fleets which the power and resources of the country could create.

Mr. FARLEY. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WELLS.] I am a New England man, and I represent a sea-board district in the extreme North-east. I represent a constituency who feel an interest in the increase of the naval power of this country. They feel the necessity for such an increase. I understand that the whole number of vessels now in the Navy is about seventy. How many of those vessels are available? Only forty. I call the attention of the committee to one fact, which it strikes me has not been sufficiently taken into consideration in the discussion of this matter; and it is this: that the increase of the naval power of this country, for the last ten or fifteen years, has not kept pace with the growth of our mercantile marine. Since 1844 the number of vessels annually built has doubled.

The increase of your tonnage has been in a much greater ratio. In 1844 the gross amount of tonnage built was something like sixty-four thousand tons; for the year ending June 30, 1852, the amount of tonnage built was three hundred and fifty-one thousand tons; showing within that time an annual average increase of something like fifty per centum. Again, look at the gross amount of the tonnage of this country. For the year ending June, 1852, it was over four millions of tons. We have not had returns for the year ending June, 1853, but, undoubtedly, the gross amount of tonnage for that year is equal to four and one half millions of tons.

Now, I ask if your naval power is at all adequate to the protection of this commerce? It is a well known fact that the very large proportion of your mercantile marine is engaged in your foreign trade. The value of that four and a half millions of tonnage cannot be short of $200,000,000.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the mercantile marine of the country is strongly linked and attached to the naval power. It is to be found on every sea; and wherever it goes, the protection and sympathy which are extended to it by the naval power of the country, whether your vessel-of-war be a large one or a small one, is felt and appreciated by the master and the seaman.

Sir, an intelligent Englishman made this remark to me in reference to this principle of naval protection. He said that the great secret of the power of the British Government, and the great cause of the loyalty of English subjects, was this: that the British Government stood ready always and everywhere, wherever her citizens and their property might be, to protect them and it. I would have our Government to adopt and carry out the same principle, not in the spirit of a filibuster; but I would have our Government say to the world that wherever our citizens go, and wherever their property is to be found, that there we are prepared to sustain them and their rights.

I was glad, Mr. Chairman, to hear the allusions made by the gentleman from New York, over the way, [Mr. PECKHAM,] in regard to the necessity which will probably soon be pressing upon us with reference to this matter. The nations of Europe are now, or undoubtedly soon will be, engaged in war. What will be the effect of that state of things? They are large maritime powers. Our country will feel the influence of the war; and I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is one of the occasions which calls upon us to prepare for events which, without doubt, must soon take place. We do not know the construction which these great European Powers may entertain, so far as the rights of the property of neutrals are concerned. And for that reason, sir, I would be prepared to meet any emergency which may occur.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WELLS.]

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LYON. I move to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, as it seems to be a foregone conclusion that it is to pass without amendment; and this course, if adopted, will save the trouble of sending the bill again to the Senate.

Mr. HENN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. HENN. It is, that it is not now in order to move to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa. If there are no further amendments to the first section of the bill, the Clerk will now proceed to read the second section.

Mr. ASHE. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not yet been read through; and it would not be in order to adopt that course.

Mr. ASHE. Well, then, let it be read through.

Mr. ORR. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That each of said frigates shall not exceed fifteen hundred tons burden.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary that I should proceed to give, in detail, any views I may have upon the subject. I suppose the determination of the committee is to pass this bill in the shape in which it came to them from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I offer the amendment, however, simply to indicate my views of the proper course and policy to be pursued in making this increase of the Navy.

If the vessels are constructed of fifteen hundred tons burden, they will subserve all the purposes desired by the Secretary of the Navy. They will carry from seven to ten guns, and the cost of them will be from two to three hundred thousand dollars less than if the vessels are constructed according to the plan contemplated in the bill. As I understand it, the vessels to be constructed under the provisions of this bill are to be of twenty-five hundred tons burden, and they will cost upwards of $800,000 each, making the six vessels cost $5,000,000. If constructed according to the proviso I have offered, they will cost the Government about $600,000, according to the information I have; and they will answer every purpose. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. My friend from South Carolina ought first to give notice of his intention to move to amend the title of the bill. I object very much to passing a law to build frigates, and then make brigs of them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Sloops rather.

Mr. BAYLY. They would not be more than brigs. It was a complaint in the late war with Great Britain that our frigates carried more than the number of guns which a frigate had the right to carry; that our frigates were "seventy-fours," and our "seventy-fours" one hundred and twenty gun ships. I do not want to take the back track in that respect, and make our frigates brigs—I was going to say schooners—but certainly as low as brigs.

Mr. MILLSON. My colleague will allow me to say that these new steam propellers are intended to carry fifty guns. The steamers Princeton and Susquehanna, the tonnage of which are twenty-four hundred tons, carry only about nine guns, yet he thinks that these new propellers of fifteen hundred tons may only carry from seven to ten guns.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. ORR, it was put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MATTESON. I now offer the amendment which I offered before, and desire the Clerk to read it.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, full and complete plans, maps, specifications, and estimates of the cost of all such steamers shall be made by the Secretary of the Navy, and shall be submitted to a board of officers consisting of five officers of the Navy of the grade of captain, and five practical ship builders, to be named and selected by the President; and such persons, with the Secretary of the Navy, shall be denominated a Board of Construction; and such board shall have power to alter, modify, or amend such plans and specifications in such respect as it may deem expedient and proper.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the work to be done, and the materials to be furnished according to such plans, maps, and specifications to be approved by said board, shall be contracted for in behalf of the United States by said Board of Construction, at a meeting to be held by said board, at such place, in the city of Washington, at such time as the Secretary of the Navy shall in his discretion direct. Public notice of the times of meeting at the said place for the reception of sealed proposals for entering into contracts for any of the said work, shall be published in at least two public newspapers having the largest circulation in the cities of New Orleans, Charleston, Richmond, Norfolk, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Portland, at least four weeks prior to the time of such meeting.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any work or materials shall be contracted for by said Board of Construction, all proposals or contracts for work to be done or materials to be furnished, herein authorized, shall be subject to the following conditions and restrictions:

First. All such proposals shall be for a sum certain as to the price to be paid for each and every kind of work, and for the quality and quantity of every material that shall be furnished.

Second. Every proposal shall be in writing, and shall be sealed up, and shall be accompanied by an affidavit indorsed thereon of each person uniting in such proposal, that he is not directly or indirectly interested in any other proposal for the same work or materials, or any part of the same; that he has no agreement or understanding with any other person to become interested in any other proposal or contract for the same work or materials, or any part thereof; and that no other person than such as shall be named in the proposal is interested in the same, or has any agreement or understanding to become interested in any contract that may be made in pursuance of such proposal.

Third. No proposal for work or material authorized by this act shall be received or considered, unless the same shall be accompanied with a bond to the people of the United States, in such penalty as shall be required by the contracting board, not less than twenty nor more than fifty per cent. of the estimate of the cost of the work proposed to be done, and materials proposed to be furnished, which bond shall be signed by the party making such proposal, and two responsible sureties, with such evidence of their respectability as the Board of Construction shall require, and which sureties shall severally justify in a sum equal to such penalty; and which bond shall be conditioned, that if the contract shall be awarded to the party making such proposal, that he or they will, within ten days after such award, enter into contract for the performance of the work and furnishing of the materials referred to in such proposal, upon the terms prescribed by the contracting board; and, also, the further condition that the contractor or contractors, after making such contract as aforesaid, shall, and will, without delay, enter upon the execution thereof, and fully and faithfully perform the same, according to the stipulations contained therein; and, upon his or their failure to enter into such contract, that the obligors in the said bond will forfeit and pay into the Treasury of the United States a sum equal to ten per cent. upon the estimate of the same at the price named in the proposition, as liquidated damages; and, if any breach shall occur in the condition of such bond, the same shall be handed over immediately to the Attorney General, who is hereby authorized and required forthwith to prosecute the same, and, without delay, to recover and collect the liquidated damages specified in the condition thereof, and all damages sustained by the United States by the non-performance of the said contract, or any part thereof; and the same shall not be compromised, nor shall the prosecution or collection of the same be delayed or suspended by any board or officer. Upon the failure or refusal of the person or persons to whom a contract may be awarded to enter into the same, it shall be the duty of the contracting board to proceed forthwith to let the same in the manner required by law; or they may, in their discretion, award such contract to the next lowest bidder at the same letting; and, in case he will not enter into contract for the same on the terms required by this act, the same shall be advertised anew, and be let according to law.

Fourth. No acceptance of a proposal or award of a contract by the said board, and no contract made by the said board, or any interest in the same, shall be assignable to any person or persons; and every agreement for any such assignment shall be absolutely void, and no payment for work done or materials furnished pursuant to a contract, shall be made to any general attorney or agent of the contracting party, but only to such party in person or to the agent of such party specially authorized to receive the particular payment then due.

Fifth. In every contract there shall be a provision that fifteen per centum of the amount of any work done or materials furnished at the contract price thereof, shall be reserved by the Board of Construction until the whole work which is the subject of the contract shall be fully and entirely completed.

Sixth. Any other provision that may be directed by the said Board of Construction, not inconsistent with the provisions of law, calculated to insure the faithful execution of any contract, shall be inserted therein.

Seventh. All contracts for work or materials shall be made with the person or persons who shall offer to do or provide the same at the lowest price, with adequate security for their performance.

Eighth. All proposals for work or materials shall be publicly opened and read by the Board of Construction, and shall be marked by one of them as having been received and so read, specifying the time, and shall be copied at large in a book to be provided for that purpose, and the original, within thirty days, be filed in the Navy Department.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no officer of the United States shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract; and every such contract in which any such person may be or become thus interested shall be void and declared forfeited by the Board of Construction on discovery of the fact; and every person becoming so interested shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Before the reading of the amendment was completed,

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to a question of order. This amendment commences with section three, and I submit that the only point where it can come in is after the second section. The second section has not been read, and therefore the amendment is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is for the committee, and not for the Chair, to decide at what point the amendment shall come in as an independent section.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to another question of order. The amendment consists of two or three sections. Under our rules, we can have but one section of a bill under consideration at a time in committee, and I submit, therefore, that it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MATTESON. Mr. Chairman, I propose to strike out of the first section of the bill the words: "said vessels and machinery to be built by contract, or in the Government navy-yards, as the Secretary of the Navy may think most advisable for the public interest," and to insert in their stead what has been read by the Clerk. The bill under consideration leaves the whole matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and to his discretion alone. While I do not question his character in any respect, both for ability and integrity, yet I submit to the committee whether it is not better to leave the discretion with five officers of the grade of captain in the Navy, and five practical ship-builders. We all know that there is a very deep impression on the public mind that ships can be quite as well and much cheaper built at private ship-yards than they are at the Government navy-yards. That, I say, is the general impression. I have been informed by a gentleman upon this floor from the East, that ships are much cheaper and better built there by private enterprise than at the navy-yards of the Government.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] stated that almost everything entering into the construction of a ship was now provided for by contract. The last three sections of my amendment throw additional guards around the purchase that may be made. Is it not better that the discretion which is proposed by the bill to be given to a single individual, should be left with naval officers and expert mechanics? The President is allowed by the amendments I offer, the selection of the ship-builders, and would no doubt select men of character and competency. Will you not have better work? Will you not reconcile the two interests, the naval interest on the one side and the ship-building on the other, which are now at loggerheads? All these, it seems to me, will be accomplished if the amendment be adopted.

I see nothing inconsistent in my proposition with the construction of the steamers at the Government navy-yards if the Board of Construction I propose shall be appointed. Yesterday the distinguished and venerable member from Missouri [Mr. BENSON] seemed to think that it would be a useless proceeding to let out the building of ships when we had our own navy-yards. That depends upon the question whether we can construct vessels for the Navy cheaper and better by contract with the mechanics and ship-building interests of the country than by the Navy Department alone? But my amendments do not preclude the use of the navy-yards if the Board of Construction should deem it advisable. It will, in my opinion, be much more satisfactory to the country that the discretion in this matter shall be left to the naval officers and the mechanics proposed by me, than to the head of the Department alone.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, for reasons which I will proceed to state as briefly as possible, because I think the committee has been unnecessarily detained in the consideration of this bill.

There is every provision now in the organization of the Navy Department that is provided for in the gentleman's amendment. The Chief of the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair, is a skillful naval architect, of unquestionable talent and extended experience in his profession. Besides this, there are five naval constructors, who are experienced ship-carpenters, and an Engineer in Chief of the Navy, with a reputation unexcelled by that of any one in that profession of the mechanic arts. To give additional means of success in building and draughting war steamers, Mr. Copeland, the gentleman who, I understand, draughted and superintended the building of the engines for the Collins line of steamers, is now connected with the Navy Department as consulting engineer. Then there are captains in the Navy at the head of the different bureaus, who have had much experience in the building and providing the armament for vessels-of-war, who can and doubtless will be consulted by the Secretary of the Navy. While I have no authority for saying so, yet my impression is that it is not likely, therefore, that the Secretary of the Navy will, upon his own limited experience and observation, take upon himself the entire responsibility of ordering the building of these vessels without the preliminaries usual and proper upon all such occasions.

The Secretary of the Navy has urged the necessity of building these vessels, and does so from a patriotic impulse. He has the honor of his country's flag at heart, and desires, as he says in his recent able report, to protect American commerce upon the seas of the world, and our citizens wherever inclination or business may lead them. In relation to the increase of the Navy, he eloquently says:

"The result of my investigation of this subject is a decided conviction that the maintenance of our proper and elevated rank among the great Powers of the world; the just protection of our wide-spread and growing commerce; the defense of our thousands of miles of coast along the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, the lakes, and the Gulf of Mexico; the recent marked improvements in the art of naval architecture adopted by other nations—all unite in demonstrating the policy, the necessity, of an increase of the Navy. It is true, indeed, our policy is peace. No lust of dominion, no spirit of aggression, marks out our course. Our national mission is, by the moral force of example to illustrate the blessings of liberty and peace, civilization, and religion.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, APRIL 4, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 53.

"But the reasonable inquiry is, can peace be best maintained by the exhibition of comparative weakness, or by a display of strength and a preparation which, while it invites not a conflict, at least defies assaults? What are the objects of a navy—what the considerations to guide us to a correct conclusion as to the size and character of the naval force of a Republic situated geographically and politically as the United States? Do not wisdom and prudence admonish the careful statesman, in his calculations for the future, while he takes thought of the commerce, the rights, the coast to be protected by this right arm of defense, at the same time not to be unmindful of the comparative force, efficiency, and character of the navies of the great Powers with whom, with all our cherished love of peace, we may have to contend? Is it the suggestion of a sound discretion to rely exclusively upon the sudden preparation of a patriotic people, when the perilous emergency starts up before them, and shut our eyes with quick composure to our real condition? Or is it wiser to make the preparation which a considerate glance at the true state of facts shall persuade us is essential to our security?"

So far as the propriety of the gentleman's amendment in relation to the contract system goes, that has been pretty fully discussed, and little more need be said, I apprehend, upon that point. Every investigation into its propriety for vessels-of-war, has led to its abandonment. When four steamers (the Powhatan, Susquehanna, Saranac, and San Jacinto) were ordered to be built during Mr. Polk's administration, the proceedings of the Naval Board, who were ordered by the Secretary of the Navy to inquire into the expediency of building those vessels by contract, were indorsed as follows:

"In the present state of the service, I do not think it will be for the public interest to construct either of the steamers authorized by Congress for the Navy, by contract, and I see no reason, therefore, to exercise the authority intensioned above. JAMES K. POLK.

"WASHINGTON, June 21, 1847."

It is well known to all who pay attention to these matters, that both the British and French Governments have latterly from time to time, either from press of work or the cry of economy, tried the contract system for building ships-of-war. In the reports of the British Parliament, for example, that of 1815 on the Navy, it is stated by Mr. Seppings how inferior all the contract ships were, to those built in the dock-yards. It was not denied, in the examination referred to by him, and the witnesses who were interested in the issue, said they did all they agreed to, and all they thought was necessary. The worst materials were put in, and the least possible fastenings, and it was found that where long bolts should have been used, they were only eight or nine inches long. Those who risked their lives in these ships called these short bolts "devils."

Upon the subject of ships-of-war built by contract, the reports of the British House of Commons, in the debate of 9th May, 1848, shows the result of eight years' observation on that subject:

	Built by Government.		Built by contract.
	Petrel.	Penguin.	Ranger.	Alert.
Total first cost new.....	£8,219	£8,386	£7,620	£7,472
Repairs in eight years.....	1,314	1,540	7,315	5,163
Mean cost per year.....	1,191	1,240	1,792	1,579

Difference in favor of Government-built vessels, £940 per year.

In France, the reports of the Chamber of Deputies show the same results. In the report of the Committee of the Navy, which sat from 1849 to 1852, it is repeatedly stated that several, and, indeed, all the vessels built by contract had immediately to undergo a heavy repair to strengthen them. A committee, raised upon the subject of building ships-of-war, although of the most radical kind, made no recommendation to build ships by contract. I have previously referred briefly to our own experience in this matter. Why, sir, a merchant ship requires but little extra strength, beyond that to resist the sea, or perhaps to get insurance. A ship-of-war must be strong enough to stand the jar of firing her own guns, and to receive the shot of an enemy. Besides, sir, it is not true that our ships-of-war are not fast sailers. Why, a single instance may be referred to, to prove otherwise. It is but a few weeks ago I read in the newspapers (and that, we all know, is a proper source to be informed of the truth) that one of our best-built ships-of-war, the Portsmouth, "held her own" with a clipper ship. Ours, a strong, live-oak, copper-fastened ship, now eight or ten years old, equaling the speed of a new clipper, built of chestnut, Grand Island oak, and yellow pine, which, being so light, will, in two or three years, perhaps, be shaken to pieces. This is really something to be proud of. But to return to the Department and its attaches.

Now, sir, as I have said, and I believe, there are no abler or more experienced men in the line of their profession than the men connected with the Engineers and Construction Bureaus of the Navy Department; but, in saying this, sir, I do not intend to detract from the genius or skill of any American mechanic. I am very willing to admit, with my friend from New York, [Mr. WALSH,] that George Steers—and I am proud of his merited success—the builder of the yacht America, achieved a great victory in England. I do not desire to pluck the laurels from his brow. I am very willing to believe that, if he was connected with the Construction Department, the Government would derive much benefit from his experience and ability. But while I will not detract from the character that George Steers has won as an American mechanic, I will not stand upon this floor and permit, even by implication, as the adoption of the gentleman's amendment would, I fear, that John Lenthall's character, as a skillful constructor and naval architect, is less entitled to our consideration and confidence. He, too, is an American mechanic of genius and skill. I know him intimately, and I am proud to speak of his mechanical character, and award him well-earned fame. He deserves to occupy a proud position among American mechanics. I refer, sir, to, and have named, the chief of the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair. And so with Mr. Martin and Mr. Copeland, the chief and consulting officer of the Engineer Department. They are also at the head of their interesting and scientific art, whether mechanical in the construction of the engines, or professional in the application of steam as a means of propulsion of vessels-of-war. The gentlemen at the head of the Bureaus of the Navy Department, who have been denominated in this debate as of a by-gone age—I was going to say "Old Fogies," but I do not like to use the words—are entitled to our admiration and respect. In the darkest hour of our country's peril, these "old captains" braved danger, and defended their country's starry banner in the thickest of the assaults of our enemies. They are brave men, who never flinched when their services were needed.

I vividly recollect, that in first reading the history of the war of 1812 how my heart yearned towards our brave officers and gallant tars; how I have been inspired with the recollection of the contest for "free trade and sailor's rights;" and I recollect that the glorious achievements by our Navy inspired the American arms everywhere. Why, Mr. Chairman, the history of "the last war," as it was called, is familiar, I am sure, to all of us. We were unprepared at its commencement, as the chairman of the Naval Committee said, in his very eloquent opening speech. Millions of dollars were lost to the country in consequence, from spoiliations upon our commerce. The nation was divided upon the question of the war. The enemy's fleets were hovering all around us. The naval victories achieved by our brave officers and gallant tars broke the spell, and we bounded to life, liberty, and happiness again. The proud mistress of the seas had been humbled, and the star-spangled banner of freedom floated in victory. Mr. Madison's administration acquired strength, his friends confidence, and the Army and Navy were given assurance of victory and fame. Our cities and towns blazed with illuminations, bonfires were lighted on every hill top—

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MATTESON,] by striking out the words "and Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen laugh at the idea of striking out the words "Secretary of the Navy," and leaving that officer out of this Board of Construction. I do not think that those gentlemen, if they were desirous of building five sloops, which would require an appropriation of $500,000, would place it in the hands of a man who does not know a sloop from a yawl-boat. The Secretary of the Navy is a very worthy and talented man, no doubt, but I do not believe that he is competent for his business, particularly that of building these steamers. From the official register, published under his authority, it seems that the United States Navy, exclusive of store-ships, and one vessel on the stocks at Lake Ontario, consists of sixty-two vessels of all sizes, carrying one thousand nine hundred and ninety-one guns. Of this number the official record states that seven hundred and two guns are at sea, while twelve hundred and eighty-nine guns are lying idle and rusting, and the ships are rotting in the navy-yards.

The Secretary has been in office but a year, and he now comes and asks for six war steamers. I am willing to grant these six steamers by my vote, but I am unwilling to place them entirely in his hands. We have nine ships-of-the-line, and not one of them is at sea. Three of them are now used as receiving ships, three are in ordinary, and three on the stocks. Eight hundred guns are thus lying useless. Of the thirteen frigates belonging to our Navy, seven of them are lying at our dock yards, five are in ordinary, and two are on the stocks. Three hundred and fifty-six guns are here lying useless. We have three sloops-of-war lying idle, having sixty-two guns, and one frigate, of four guns; three steamers, of sixty-seven guns, in the same condition; showing the sum total of one thousand two hundred and eighty-nine guns lying useless; while the ships are rotting at the dock-yards. And yet, under this state of things, this bill proposes to give entire power to the Secretary of the Navy for the construction of these steamers. I am opposed to giving it to him, and I am in favor of establishing a bureau, as my colleague from New York [Mr. MATTESON] has proposed.

I move to strike out the words "Secretary of the Navy," because I think that the remainder of the board can do a good deal better without him. If my amendment does not prevail, I shall vote for the bill presented by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I should have preferred if he had made the number of steamers twelve instead of six. I will vote for six, and I will vote for that number when the Senate bill comes in; but I am opposed to conferring so much discretionary power over the matter upon the Secretary of the Navy. I would be glad if the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs would offer an amendment to meet the case, and I would willingly vote for it.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. WHEELER,] as being too short, and the amendment of my other colleague [Mr. MATTESON] as being too long.

The question was then taken on Mr. WHEELER's amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MATTESON,] it was put, and disagreed to.

Mr. EASTMAN. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

So the committee refused to rise.

The second section of the bill was then read, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, and for altering, completing, and launching the frigates Santee, at Kittery, and Sabine, at New York, the sum of $3,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. McMULLIN. I offer the following amendment:

Be it further enacted, That the proceeds of the public lands shall be hereby set apart for, and appropriated to, the cost of building said vessels, and equipping the same.

And be it further enacted, That the annual proceeds of the public lands shall be appropriated to repairs of said vessels, and the support of the Navy of the United States.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state his point of order.

Mr. DEAN. The point of order is, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia is not germane to the bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. We will have to pay, Mr. Chairman, for the building of these vessels, and I presume it is not inappropriate for us to declare how the expense of building them is to be defrayed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York is well taken; and that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which has just been read, and a question of order is raised by the gentleman from New York, that the amendment is not germane. The Chair sustains that question of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Virginia appeals.

Mr. McMULLIN. I suppose debate is not in order; is it?

The CHAIRMAN. No; debate is not in order. Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Before the vote be taken, I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.

Several MEMBERS. Order; question.

The CHAIRMAN. The inquiry of the gentleman may be pertinent to the question. He will therefore state his inquiry.

Mr. STANTON. If the House determine to build ships and pay for them, has not the House the power to say where the money for defraying the expense of them is to come from?

Several MEMBERS. That is an argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky being in the nature of an argument, is not in order. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was then taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly, by special order of the House, House bill No. 52, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move the previous question on that bill. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. EASTMAN. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ELLISON. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. EASTMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Let us pass the bill."]

The question was then taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill being engrossed, it was subsequently read a third time.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The main question being, "Shall the bill pass?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Banks, Barry, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Bliss, Bocoock, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chastain, Clingman, Cook, Corwin, Cumming, Dean, Dent, Dick, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eddy, Ellison, Etheridge, Everhart, Farley, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Goode, Goodrich, Grey, Wiley P. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Walker, Waish, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Bennett, Benton, Boyce, Campbell, Caruthers, Chrisman, Cobb, Cox, Curtis, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Ready, Thos. Ritchey, Sapp, Wade, Elithu B. Washburne, and Wells—43.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the yeas and nays—

Mr. ENGLISH asked leave to record his vote, he not being in the Hall when his name was called.

Leave was refused, and he therefore gave notice that, had he been permitted to vote, he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. MATTESON also gave notice that he should have voted in the negative, but that he had paired off with Mr. ASHE.

Mr. BOCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I have made several ineffectual motions to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, in order to refer several bills, which should have been referred long since. For the purpose of accomplishing that object, I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of order. It is that—

The SPEAKER. There can be no question of order in order at this time, as a motion to adjourn takes precedence of all other motions.

The question was then taken on Mr. DEAN's motion, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly, at three o'clock and thirty minutes, adjourned to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SUMNER presented a remonstrance, signed by legal voters of Fitchburg, Worcester county, Massachusetts, and a memorial of citizens of the State of Indiana, against the passage by Congress of any act which shall infringe or impair the provision whereby in all that part of the Territory of Louisiana, north of 36° 30', slavery was forever prohibited; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVERETT presented two petitions of citizens of Boston, remonstrating against the passage of any act for the organization of Nebraska, which will permit slavery in the Territory, from which it was excluded by the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented the petition of Frances Depriest, widow of John Depriest, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON presented printed documents in relation to the claim of the Eastern Cherokees, for an additional per capita due them under the treaties of 1835, 1836, and 1846; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CASS presented a petition of citizens of Jefferson county, Pennsylvania, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens residing or traveling in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, praying the reestablishment of the military post at Fort Atkinson; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, praying the establishment of Artesian wells on the Jornada del Muerto; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, praying that measures may be taken to protect the inhabitants of that Territory from Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, praying a geological and mineralogical survey of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, praying the construction of a wagon-road from Santa Fé to Don Fernandez, in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant S. L. Frémont, praying to be restored to the position formerly held by him in the Quartermaster's Department, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of Cadwallader Wallace, praying compensation for certain Virginia military bounty land warrants, the lands appropriated for satisfying such warrants having been sold by the United States, have directed me to report adversely to the prayer of the petitioner. This claim has been reported upon favorably several times. I would call the attention of the Senators from Ohio to the fact. I do not know whether they take any interest in it or not. The committee at the present session have considered the subject very carefully, and communicated with the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon it, and have come, I believe, unanimously to the conclusion that no special legislation is proper in the case, and that all the remedy to which the petitioner is entitled can be had under the general law of Congress which authorizes him to locate a quantity of land anywhere, where it is subject to sale at the minimum price, equal to the amount of his Virginia bounty land warrant. I ask that the report may be printed.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHASE. I ask that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the consideration of the petition and papers of Joseph Clymer, of Missouri. No report has been made upon this claim; but it is the desire of the petitioner to withdraw his papers, and present them to the proper Department. I move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a petition of inhabitants of the county of Erie, Pennsylvania, praying an increase of the pension of Lyman Badger, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the memorial of William D. Merrick, and Benjamin C. Howard, agents of the State of Maryland, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to direct a reexamination of the account between the United States and the State of Maryland; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James Erwin, representative of Daniel Greathouse, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of James Erwin, of Arkansas, and others; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas C. Nye, praying compensation for the violation of a contract by the Post Office Department, for the transportation of the mails, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of A. G. Bennett, a paymaster in the United States Army, praying to be relieved from his liability for money lost or stolen while in his possession, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Catherine B. Arnold, widow of the late Major Ripley A. Arnold, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

PAPER WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of William Frost be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MASON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

DOCK AND RAILWAYS AT PENSACOLA.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate what amount has been paid to the contractors, Gilbert & Secor, and what amount is yet due to said contractors, on account of the floating basin dock, basin, and railways at the navy-yard, Pensacola, and whether the said dock, basin, and railways have been completed according to contract, and accepted by the United States; what is the present condition of said dock, basin, and railways; whether any of the stipulations of the contract have been dispensed with, and if so, what were the stipulations so dispensed with, and the reasons therefor; and, that he be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of all reports of the Commissioners that have been appointed to examine the said dock, basin, and railways; and also a copy of the contract entered into by the Navy Department with the said Gilbert & Secor for the construction of the said dock, basin, and railways.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. PETTIT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, at as early a day as convenient, whether the provisions and stipulations on the part of the United States in a treaty made with the Pottawatomie Indians on the 26th day of October, 1839, in Indiana, and particularly the fifth article of said treaty, and the promises and stipulations which Colonel A. C. Pepper, their removing agent, was authorized to and did make to said tribe of Indians, by virtue of instructions dated April 28, 1835, signed by the Commissary General of Subsistence, and now on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, have been performed and fully complied with; and if fully performed and complied with, to transmit to the Senate copies of all the vouchers showing such fulfillment and compliance; and if not fully performed, to inform the Senate in what such failure consists, and what amount of money will fully compensate said tribe of Indians for such failure or non performance on the part of the United States; and that he likewise communicate a copy of said instructions to the Senate.

NEW LARGE GOLD COINAGE.

Mr. GWIN. I present a memorial, signed by the bankers, merchants, and principal business men of San Francisco, asking for the passage of a law authorizing the coinage of gold pieces of the denomination of fifty dollars, at the branch Mint in California. I sent the memorial to the Secretary of the Treasury, with the hope of being able to receive his opinion in time to allow me to present the subject to the consideration of the Senate when the deficiency bill was pending; but the bill was passed before I received his answer.

His letter is in these terms:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 21, 1854.

SIR: I have duly considered the memorial which you placed in my hands this morning, of merchants and bankers of San Francisco, California, praying Congress to authorize the coinage, at the branch Mint at that place, of gold pieces of the denomination of fifty dollars. Upon the subject-matter of this memorial you desire my opinion, and I have, therefore, the honor to say, that, in the present condition of California, as it respects its currency, the measure recommended would, in my opinion, be judicious and proper.

The larger denominations of gold coinage are not found to be adapted to circulation in the Atlantic States. It is found that few of the twenty-dollar pieces, and not a great many of the tens remain in private hands, but are soon passed into the possession of the banks and brokers, and their places supplied by bank paper. The larger pieces are also more convenient for transportation; and being thus carried to the South and West prevent the transit of the smaller coins, which would, if transmitted, remain in permanent circulation amongst the people in those sections of the country. For these and other reasons, it appears to me to be desirable to increase the coinage of the smaller denominations, and to diminish the larger, for circulation on this side of the Union; and the increased capacity of the Treasury for coinage, arising from the establishment of the branch Mint at San Francisco, and of the assay office at New York, will enable it to carry this view into effect.

But there are peculiarities in the condition of California which recommend a different scale of coinage for that region. These are: First, the fact stated in the memorial of the prohibition against, and entire exclusion of, paper money; and, second, the high scale of prices prevalent in California for commodities and service. These circumstances will make larger denominations of coin convenient, particularly in counting and passing large sums. To this may be added that time will be saved in coining, which may be of much consequence to miners and others, at least until the capacity of the branch Mint shall be ascertained to be equal to the gold offered.

In order to harmonize the proposed large coin with the present recognized coins, I would recommend that the coinage be authorized of pieces of $100, and $50, and $25, to be called the "Union," "half Union," and "quarter Union," but that the half Union only be struck for the present.

I am, very respectfully,

JAMES GUTHRIE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. WILLIAM M. GWIN, United States Senate.

I move that the memorial, with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM ABROAD.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, some few weeks ago I stated to the Senate that I should, ere long, ask permission to move to take from the files, and refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations, the report made at the last session by Mr. Underwood, on the subject of the rights of American citizens abroad to freedom of religious worship. I now make that motion. I do not do it, however, with a view to have the matter taken up at the present moment, but I will ask the Senate to hear me upon it on this day three weeks. I believe that will be as convenient a time as any other; but if this stands in the way of any other business, I shall be willing to postpone it, for I am in no hurry.

I desire, however, to make some remarks upon the subject. I feel particularly called upon to do so in consequence of some animadversions upon our proceedings, to which I alluded before. I therefore ask the Senate to allow me on that day, if nothing else stands in the way, to take up this motion, and to submit my remarks to the Senate upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not exactly understand the honorable Senator's motion.

Mr. CASS. My motion is, that the report made from the Committee on Foreign Relations at the last session, on the subject of religious freedom to American citizens abroad, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. CASS. I do not ask that the motion be considered at this time; but I wish the Senate to allow me to make some remarks upon the subject on this day three weeks.

The PRESIDENT. Then the Chair understands that the Senator from Michigan moves to postpone the further consideration of his motion until this day three weeks, and that it be made the special order for that day?

Mr. CASS. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to; and the subject was made the special order for the 24th instant.

JAMES M. GOGGIN.

Mr. RUSK. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of James M. Goggin, have directed me to report a bill for his relief. It is a very plain case, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider it now.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Postmaster General to settle and adjust the claims of Mr. Goggin, and to allow him a fair and reasonable salary as special mail agent for the State of California, from December 1, 1850, to April 6, 1853, with reasonable allowances for office rent, per diem, and hire of a clerk.

Mr. RUSK. One word in explanation of the bill. Mr. Goggin was special mail agent for the State of California for the period mentioned in the bill. The duty devolved upon him of performing the duties of mail agent, by contract, upon the routes in that State. He found that it was impossible to do it at the salary and the per diem allowance which he was to receive, and without the assistance of a clerk. He wrote letters to the Postmaster General declining to act, seeing that the expenses were such that he could not do it but at a loss. The Postmaster General, however, insisted that he should go on in the performance of his duties, and then bring the subject before Congress, for the purpose of obtaining relief. The proof in the case is very clear, Goggin performed all the duties devolving upon him, and, in accordance with the suggestion of the Postmaster General, he comes to Congress for remuneration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate now take up the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, explanatory of the law regulating the number of cadets, which was postponed the other day at the request of my honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] It is pressed upon me by the Department.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolutions.

Mr. STUART. I barely want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois, without interfering with the provisions of the joint resolution at all. This should not apply to a case where, upon the reorganization of the districts in a State, the districts are decreased, as the resolution will by its terms. It is known that the policy has been to keep the number of representatives about as they are; and the consequence is, that the old States lose in proportion as the new ones increase. The provisions of this resolution would increase the cadets in those instances, although the number of districts might be decreased. I think there might be some amendment to the resolution not avoid this.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the honorable Senator labors under a misapprehension. I have examined that point particularly; but no legislation is necessary. The original law diminishes the number if the number of districts is decreased.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir. But the Senator will see that the effect of the resolution is this: If, in the reorganization of the districts in a State a district is formed within which there is no cadet at the time, this resolution is intended to have one appointed. To illustrate my meaning: Suppose in a State which had five districts that, upon a new arrangement of districts, the number is reduced to four, and it still shall happen that there is one of the four in which there is no resident cadet, the State would get an additional cadet although it lost a district; that certainly cannot be the intention of this resolution. It is to provide for the case where there is an additional district formed and there is no cadet in it; at least that ought to be its provision.

Mr. SHIELDS. The object of this resolution is to have a cadet from every district. In the case which the Senator presents to the Senate, if a district was made vacant by a new arrangement, although there would be a diminution of the number of cadets, the resolution would give a cadet for that district, but at the next appointment the number of cadets would be diminished. This is only a temporary arrangement, and at the next rearrangement the proportion will be reestablished.

Mr. STUART. So I understand; but I submit, as a matter of prudence, that the number of cadets in a State should not be increased where the number of congressional districts is diminished. I do say to the Senator, that if my own judgment were to prevail I should not like the resolution at all; but I do not intend to object to its application where the number of the districts in a State shall be increased, and one shall be found without a cadet. Yet, sir, the resolution certainly should be amended, so as to provide that it shall not apply to any State where the number of districts on a rearrangement shall be diminished. It might happen very well that all the cadets in a State would be thrown into one district under a rearrangement, and still the number of districts in the State would be reduced; and yet, under this resolution, there might be several additional cadets from that very State.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will state that that does not alter the case in one iota. The general law provides that every district in the United States shall be entitled to one cadet. By a new arrangement, whether it diminishes the number of districts in a State or increases the number, does not alter the principle. By the new arrangement, it happens that at this time there are some districts left without any cadets. I have inquired into the matter since the case was before the Senate last, and I find, by a memorandum which I have before me, that "the difficulty arises in consequence of the apportionment of the different States in conformity to the census of 1850, leaving more districts vacant than there are vacancies in the academy at the present time; but in making the appointments for the following term, it must of necessity conform to the act." That is, at the next appointment there will be only one for each district; consequently, this is only to give a remedy to a temporary derangement, as it may be called, which has been occasioned by the rearrangement of the districts. My own opinion is, that the War Department ought to have acted upon the principle of the honorable Senator, when the number was diminished and increased alike—that is, to apportion the cadets among the new districts without reference to their residence; but they have not done so. They say the law is obligatory, and that they were compelled to confine the cadets to the districts in which they reside. That leads to the difficulty; but the thing is done, and we cannot undo it. The other districts have no cadets. The object of the resolution is to let those districts that have no cadets appoint. At the next term all will be rectified, and each district will have its cadet; so that there will not be two in one district.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not know that I understand this matter exactly. If I do understand the existing law, each State is entitled to a number of cadets equal to the number of congressional districts in the State, one to be taken from each district. Under a new apportionment, or under any act of the Legislature redistricting any State, it may so turn out that two or three cadets to which the State is entitled may fall into one district, and the others be vacant. This is intended to remedy the evil. But you suffer the State to have three cadets from one district, perhaps cadets who are to remain there for four years, giving that State an additional number, which the Legislature may create by a rearrangement of the districts. I see no necessity, from the mere fact of distributing the cadets among the States, to increase the representation beyond the number to which it is entitled.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is correct. The general law says that each district shall have a cadet, and the cadet shall reside in the district. Now, by the new arrangement, two or three cadets are thrown into one district, and a few of the new-formed districts have no cadets. The object of the resolution is to remedy that.

Mr. STUART. For the purpose of carrying out my wishes, I shall offer an amendment to this effect:

Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall not apply to any State in which the number of congressional districts shall be reduced.

A SENATOR. That will defeat the object of the resolution.

Mr. STUART. If that will be its effect, I submit to the Senate that the resolution ought to be defeated. The general law stands on the principle that each congressional district shall be entitled to have one cadet at the Military Academy. If the effect of this resolution is, upon a rearrangement of the districts, to increase the number of cadets in a State, not in proportion to the population, not in proportion to the number of districts, but in proportion to the accident by which the lines of any new districts may be determined, the whole resolution ought to be defeated. There is no doubt about that, because it is at war with the principle upon which the Academy at West Point is established. For instance, as I intimated awhile ago, suppose that in the arrangement of the districts upon a new enumeration of inhabitants, the State of New York shall lose three congressional districts, yet it might happen under this resolution that she would gain ten cadets. Each cadet is to be located, when appointed, in the congressional district from which he is appointed, but anywhere in that district; and a rearrangement, I say, might throw them into other districts, and might, in the case I have put, leave New York with ten new districts without a cadet in any of them, while, at the same time, she would lose three districts. Thus, while her representation would be decreased, you would add ten to the number of her cadets at West Point. If that is the effect of the resolution, and is to remain the effect of it, I submit again to the Senate it ought to be defeated.

I know that the amendment which I propose will not remedy the evil entirely, but it will do this: it will only give additional cadets at West Point to a State where there are additional districts made in the State. It will then be substantially within the principle upon which the cadets are sent to West Point. But if the resolution is allowed to stand as it does now, and the number of cadets is to be increased to a State which is diminished in its congressional districts, then there can be no apology for it whatever.

Mr. ADAMS. I would move to amend the amendment, by adding a proviso to the following effect:

Provided further, That no State shall at any time have more cadets at West Point than the number of representatives she is entitled to in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is not worth while to attempt to pass the joint resolution, either with the amendment of the honorable Senator from Michigan, or the amendment of the honorable Senator from Mississippi. The honorable Senator from Michigan seems to think it would be well to except from the operation of the resolution those States in which the number of districts may be diminished. The principle of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Mississippi is precisely the same. Now, sir, the object of this resolution is to give each district a cadet, without regard to whether the number be increased or diminished. I agree with the Senator from Michigan, that some States, for the time being, will, under its operation, have a greater number of cadets than they have congressional districts; but that will only be until this term expires. Then each new appointment will be from a new district. This is only to remedy a temporary confusion, a temporary derangement, owing to the changes of the districts.

If you lay down the principle, that no State is to have a greater number of cadets than it has congressional districts, then this resolution is altogether wrong, and so is the general law. It does not matter whether the number of districts in a State be increased or diminished, the principle is the same. The principle of the general law is, that cadets shall not be regulated by States, but by districts. I do not say whether that is right or wrong. Each district, says the general law, shall have a cadet, and the cadet shall live in the district. In carrying out that law, it happens that there are some districts—not many—which have no cadets. I understand, on inquiry, that the effect of the resolution will be to increase the number of cadets by seven only for the time being, and until the next appointment. Then they will again be proportioned to the number of districts. But, sir, as I repeat, if the object is that a State shall have only as many cadets as it has districts, this resolution ought to be defeated. If, on the contrary, every district should have a cadet, it is necessary that those districts which now have no cadets should have them.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Senators from Michigan and Mississippi reduce their amendments to writing?

Mr. STUART reduced his amendment to writing, as follows:

Provided That this resolution shall not apply to any State in which the number of congressional districts shall be diminished.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw my amendment to that amendment. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. TOUCEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are too exact in this matter. If I understand the existing law, it is meant to be that every district shall have a cadet at West Point; but by an irregularity, which has been created by changing the districts, it cannot now be carried out. The object of the joint resolution is that those districts which now have no cadets shall have them. The consequence of that will be a super-numerary number, a very few, temporarily; and that results, because those who are now at this institution will continue through their terms—perhaps a year, perhaps two years, and some perhaps for a longer time. But the moment they graduate, every district in the country will be entitled to one cadet. I do not see how it can be accomplished in any other way than that proposed in the resolution.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan is, I think, wrong. I know of no reason why a district in one State should be debarred from a cadet because some other district in the State may have two cadets. The principle is to give to every district a cadet, and the object of the present resolution is to carry out that principle. As soon as a certain number of those who are now at the Military Academy, shall graduate, the irregularity will cease. If that is the case, I think the report of the Committee on Military Affairs should be sustained.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is precisely the case.

Mr. STUART. I have but a few words to say in reply to the Senator from Connecticut. It is now 1854 and a cadet who goes into this institution goes there for four years, and the term of one who goes now will expire in 1858. In two years, then, after his term shall expire, there will be another enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, which will produce a recurrence of precisely the same difficulty. We cannot help it, because the cadets are increased in the new States and reduced in the old as the congressional districts are, and they are appointed on the principle of coming from districts.

Now, the question is whether you will let the seven districts referred to remain as they are until the term of the cadets at West Point in the particular States expires, and then let the cadet go where he ought to go, to the new district; or whether you will now increase the number of cadets by seven, and, at another enumeration, increase them still further, and that, too, without any reference to the number of districts in a State? Upon every rearrangement of congressional districts in a State, the chances are that one or more districts will be left without any cadets. I undertake to say that this will happen under every enumeration which will take place hereafter; and on every rearrangement of the districts in every ten years the same necessity will recur again.

Now, sir, while it is true that one cadet is appointed for each district, it is equally true, I think, that the intention is that a State shall have no more cadets than it has congressional districts; that is, no more new appointments. I undertook to remedy somewhat the confusion which exists by introducing my amendment. I confess that my own judgment is against the entire proposition.

Mr. RUSK. One part of the resolution provides that the present number of cadets shall be continued to those States which have lost by the last enumeration. So far as that is concerned, I have no objection to it. But, as the resolution stands, it introduces a confusion, which suggested itself to my mind on hearing it read, and which has not been remedied by any of the explanations which have been made, or any of the amendments which have been suggested. The difficulty is this: Upon a rearrangement of congressional districts, if two cadets fall into one district, and there is none for a new district which may be arranged by the Legislature, that new district, under the resolution, will get a cadet. That is to continue as the law, through all time, until repealed. The present law goes upon the principle that each State is entitled to as many cadets at West Point as representatives in Congress. Now, take the whole thirty-one States; I venture to say there is not a single year in which there is not in some States a rearrangement of congressional districts. This provision would continue to apply; and thus, whenever there was a rearrangement of districts in a State, and two cadets fell into one district, that State would have one more cadet than she was properly entitled to.

Mr. SHIELDS. The honorable Senator from Texas has pointed out the only difficulty in this resolution; that is that it may become permanent. I intended myself to move an amendment to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things hereafter; but I am informed that there will be no danger on that point, for I understand that the Department will provide against the recurrence of any such derangement hereafter. I think, however, it might be very well, perhaps, as there is some dispute about the matter, to amend the resolution now, so as to prevent any such derangement in future. That could be done by inserting a provision, that hereafter in no new arrangement of any State, shall there be more cadets allowed to any State than there are districts within it. I will accept such an amendment on the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Texas, although, as I have remarked, the Department itself intends to endeavor to provide against the difficulty in future.

Mr. ADAMS. I should be glad to know of the Senator from Illinois, what necessity there is for making an exception now to the rule which he is willing shall prevail hereafter? If there be a vacancy in any of the districts, it is the act of the Legislatures of the different States, and not the fault of Congress.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will state that I think the Department might assign a cadet who is at this time in the Military Academy, to a new district, although he may reside in another district. This would prevent the difficulty. This amendment will enable the Department to do that hereafter.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STUART, there were ayes 16, noes 14—no quorum voting.

Mr. BADGER. There seems to be some real difficulty about perfecting this resolution. Gentlemen are disposed to amend it. They seem to differ as to the effect and operation of it. I confess, for one, that I am not prepared to decide, and do not understand which is the preferable plan of those suggested—the original resolution, or as it will be modified by the adoption of the proposed amendment. I do not see any necessity for its immediate passage. I think it had better be deferred, and let us have an understanding as to what provision we are going to make.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will give me the floor, I will move to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution, for the purpose of going into Executive session.

Mr. BADGER. I am going to submit that motion myself. I move that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until this day fortnight.

Mr. RUSK. I think the better plan would be to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHIELDS. If it were recommitted to me now, I would either say that it ought to be defeated, or to pass, as it is.

Mr. RUSK. I understood that the Senator wished to amend it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will agree to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Texas, but I prefer to agree to the motion made by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, not that we can get any new light upon the subject by any means, but I am willing to let the resolution lie for the time mentioned.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until the 17th instant was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 3, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Public Lands.

CLERK TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. MACE. I offer the following resolution: Resolved, That the select Mail Steamer Committee be permitted to employ a clerk at the rate of four dollars per day during the time he may be engaged as such clerk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. MACE. I then move to suspend the rules, in order to enable me to introduce it.

The question was then put; and decided in the negative, two thirds not voting in favor thereof. So the House refused to suspend the rules.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report a bill from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads relative to the compensation of postmasters.

Mr. GREY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to present a resolution before he does that.

Mr. OLDS. I am anxious to make this report at as early a period as possible; and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to know what the proposition is first.

The bill was then read by its title for information, as follows:

"An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters."

Mr. JONES. I would inquire of the gentleman what he proposes to do with it?

Mr. OLDS. I propose, if consent is given to introduce it, to make a statement relative to the effect of the bill, and then ask the House to put it upon its passage. If that shall be objected to, I shall move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES. I think it had better not be introduced then.

Mr. OLDS. I move a suspension of the rules, in order to enable me to introduce it.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced 75 in the affirmative.

Mr. DEAN called for tellers.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would inquire if seventy-five is not less than two thirds of a quorum, and therefore that the motion is lost? If so, I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his call for tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think we had better have tellers before we proceed any further; and therefore I hope the gentleman will not withdraw the call.

Tellers were then ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. It is evident there is no quorum present. I think we had better have a call of the House.

Mr. OLDS. Let the vote be taken by tellers first.

The question was put; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. OLDS. As there seems to be no quorum voting, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If the yeas and nays were ordered it would be unavailing, as there is no quorum, and therefore no business could be transacted.

Mr. OLDS. I then move a call of the House. The question was taken; and decided in the affirmative.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll; and 137 members having answered to their names,

Mr. OLDS moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I did not hear my name called, though I was present. I ask that it may be recorded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the absentees are regularly called after the roll has been gone through with, and thus every gentleman will have an opportunity to answer to his name. For this reason the Chair will not recognize any gentleman.

Further proceedings in the call was then dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen appointed will resume their places as tellers.

Mr. CAMPBELL being absent, Mr. FAULKNER was appointed by the Speaker in his stead.

Mr. KERR. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is on a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report a bill entitled "An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters."

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 124, noes 1.

So the rules were suspended for the purpose indicated, (two thirds having voted in the affirmative.)

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, then reported a bill entitled "An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters," which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. OLDS. I ask that the bill be read through. The Clerk then read the bill through.

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed the deficiency bill, with sundry amendments, in which it asked the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. OLDS. As I propose to ask the House to put this bill upon its passage, and as what I have to say might, perhaps, as well have been said in the form of a report, had it not been for the fact that I wished to put it upon its passage, I ask the House to allow me to say what I have to say from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to one feature in the bill. It provides for the increased compensation of postmasters in all cases where they receive commissions on $100 and upwards. I desire to know if there is any provision in the bill which provides for postmasters whose compensation is less than that?

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman will see that those cases are provided for in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, such is the pressure made by the postmasters of the entire Union for speedy action upon some proposition that shall afford them relief, that I am induced to ask the House to consider, and mature, if they find it defective, and put upon its passage, the bill which I have just reported. I am emboldened, sir, to ask this favor of the House, from the fact that perhaps two thirds of the members have importuned me to take speedy action upon this measure.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have given the subject a very thorough investigation, and are unanimous in recommending the passage of the bill under consideration.

I deem it my duty to state, briefly, the reasons which have operated upon the minds of the committee, and have induced them to make the recommendation. By this course, the arguments which I now present will appear, together with the bill, in the morning's Globe, and this will enable gentlemen on to-morrow to vote understandingly, for or against the passage of the bill.

And inasmuch as this argument will be in the place of a report, I trust that, notwithstanding much of it will consist of dry and uninteresting details, nevertheless I may have the attention of the House.

The argument which I desire to present being based mostly upon facts and figures, and such estimates and tabular statements as have been furnished the committee by the Postmaster General and the Auditor of the Post Office Department, I have thought it advisable, in order to avoid all mistakes, to trust rather to my manuscript than my memory.

In order to enable the House to understand the provisions of the bill just reported, it becomes necessary for me to direct the attention of gentlemen to the provisions of former laws, under which postmasters were allowed their commissions.

Prior to the reduction of postage consequent upon the passage of the act of the 3d of March, 1851, the commission of deputy postmasters was as follows, viz: On the first $100 per quarter, 30 per cent.; on the next $300, 25 per cent.; on the next $2,000, 20 per cent.; on any sum beyond the last named amount, 8 per cent.

When the foregoing rate of commission was established, letter postage was from six to twenty-five cents, averaging not less than twelve cents upon each letter. Newspaper postage was then one cent on each paper circulated in the State where published, and one and a half cents when circulated out of the State where published.

By the act of the 3d March, 1851, Congress reduced the postage on letters to three cents when prepaid, and five cents when unpaid; and by the act of the 30th August, 1852, Congress reduced newspaper postage to one fourth of one cent in the State where printed, and one half of one cent out of the State where printed. By these two acts Congress has reduced the postage on both letters and papers to not more than one fourth what it was when the rate of commission to which I have referred was established.

Congress, upon the passage of the law of the 3d March, 1851, reducing the postage, did not see fit to change the commission allowed deputy postmasters; but gave the Postmaster General, in his discretion, power to make such increased compensation to them as would make their commission equal to what it was before the reduction of postage took place.

The sixth section of the act of the 3d March, 1851, reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That to any postmaster whose commissions may be reduced below the amount allowed at his office for the year ending the 30th of June, 1851, and whose labors may be increased, the Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to allow such additional commissions as he may deem just and proper: Provided, That the whole amount of commissions allowed each postmaster during any fiscal year shall not exceed by more than twenty per cent. the amount of commissions at such office for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851."

The effect of this provision in the law of the 3d March, 1851, was to require the Auditor of the Post Office Department, in the settlement with deputy postmasters at the end of each quarter, to have reference to the compensation of each postmaster for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1851. This House will at once perceive that the whole clerical force under the control of the Sixth Auditor, who is the Auditor for the Post Office Department, could not overhaul and compare the quarterly returns of the twenty-three thousand postmasters in the United States. It was found utterly impossible, in settling the quarterly returns of these twenty-three thousand postmasters, to have reference, four times each year, to the commissions allowed at each office for the year ending the 30th June, 1851. The consequence was, that each deputy postmaster had the fixing of his own extra compensation. To remedy this loose and unsatisfactory manner of doing business, the last Congress repealed the provision of the law of the 3d March, 1851, authorizing this additional compensation, and undertook to settle definitely the commissions of deputy postmasters; and by the act of the 3d March, 1853, allowed commissions as follows:

On the first $100, 50 per cent.
On the next $300, 40 per cent.
On the next $2,000, 35 per cent.
On all sums over $2,000, 15 per cent.

It was then supposed that these rates of commission would be about equivalent to the commissions allowed for the year ending the 30th June, 1851. In this supposition, Mr. Speaker, Congress was sadly mistaken; and the commissions, as I shall demonstrate by facts and figures, were reduced fully thirty-five per cent. below what Congress supposed they would be, and what they were for the year ending the 30th June, 1851.

The most obnoxious feature in the present law, and against the oppression of which twenty thousand intelligent American postmasters protest, is found in the fact, that while it reduces the rates of postage, the labors of all the offices have been vastly increased, at the very time that their pay has been greatly diminished.

In order, Mr. Speaker, that I might give the House some conception of this increase of labor, I have procured from the Auditor of the Post Office Department a statement of the revenues of the Department from the year 1840 up to the present time. I will send it to the Clerk to be read. [See table A in next column.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will please observe that the first reduction in postage took place under the act of 1845. This act reduced the postage on letters from six, ten, twelve and a half, eighteen and three quarters, and twenty-five cents, to five and ten cents, being an average deduction of more than one half. For the five years preceding this deduction, the amount received for letter postage, in round numbers, was, for 1841, $3,812,000; for 1842, $3,953,000; for 1843, $3,738,000; for 1844, $3,676,000; for 1845, $3,660,000. At the end of the last fiscal year the first act reducing letter postage went into operation. The next six years, although the postage was reduced more than one half, shows a much larger average revenue; consequently the number of letters received, distributed, and delivered at the various post offices, must have been more than doubled. In 1846, the letter postage amounted to $2,881,000; in 1847, the amount was $3,198,000; in 1848, for letters and stamps it was $3,340,000; in 1849, for letters and stamps it was $3,872,000; in 1850, for letters and stamps it was $4,576,000; in 1851, the last year under the five and ten cent postage, for letters and stamps it was $5,369,000. For the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1852, the first year under the three and five cent postage, for letters and stamps, $4,226,000; for 1853, for letters and stamps, $4,473,000. These two last years show that while the postage has again been reduced more than one half, the falling off in the revenue is only about one fifth, consequently the increase in letters passing through the post offices has again nearly doubled.

The same table, with reference to newspapers and periodicals, will demonstrate the same results. I need not trouble the House with a recapitulation.

Now I ask, in all candor, Mr. Speaker, have not these twenty-three thousand postmasters just cause of complaint to find their compensation greatly reduced at the very time that their labor is more than doubled? The present, sir, is a period noted for remarkably high prices of living, scarcely exceeded by the memorable times of 1816 and 1836. Labor, rents, and all kinds of produce have advanced steadily and materially in price. They are fully twenty-five per cent. higher than they were before the reduction, now so justly complained of, took place in the compensation of deputy postmasters. Sir, in consequence of this enhanced cost in living, the last Congress, and very justly too, raised the salaries of the various heads of Departments, including that of the Postmaster General, from six to eight thousand dollars. Congressmen complain, and very justly too, that they cannot live on their eight dollars per day. The clerks in all the Departments of the Government can scarcely subsist on their $900, $1,200, $1,500, and $1,800 per annum. Already, sir, we have a bill before us increasing very considerably their compensation. Mechanics and operators everywhere are striking for higher wages, and yet we have reduced the commissions of deputy postmasters more than thirty-five per cent., at the same time that we have more than doubled the labor that we require them to perform. Under such a state of things, how are these postmasters to support themselves and families? How are they to pay office rent and clerk hire? It would be no wonder, indeed, if we should hear of more frequent mail depredations. How long can honest and competent men resist the temptations which surround them, and continue in the employment of a Government that so poorly rewards them for their arduous services?

To remedy these evils, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, after mature deliberation, agreed upon the bill which I have just reported, with the exception of the proviso relative to distributing and separating post offices.

This bill, without that proviso, was submitted to the Postmaster General for his views; and it is due to that high functionary that I should say that the bill does not meet his approbation.

[A] AUDITOR'S OFFICE, March 13, 1854.

Respectfully submitted,
WILLIAM F. PHILLIPS, Auditor.

I now send to the Clerk the communication of the Postmaster General, giving his views upon the subject, and will ask that it may be read:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, February 27, 1854.

SIR: I have attentively considered the project of a "bill to regulate and increase the pay of deputy postmasters," submitted by you a short time since, and upon returning it to you I beg leave to present for your consideration the views I entertain upon the subject.

For convenient reference I will here state the rates of commission allowed upon letter postage by existing laws, as compared with the rates provided by the proposed bill:

Present Rates.	Proposed Rates.
50 per cent. on the first, $100	60 per cent. on the first, $100
40 per cent. on the next 300	50 per cent. on the next 300
35 per cent. on the next 2,000	40 per cent. on the next 2,000
15 per cent. on all over 2,400	15 per cent. on all over 2,400
10 per cent. on letters for distribution.	12½ per cent. on letters for distribution.

With the view of ascertaining the effect which the adoption of the proposed rates would have upon the revenue, as well as to obtain an estimate of the amount that would be necessary to defray the expenses of distributing offices where the commissions at present rates are insufficient, I addressed a communication to the Auditor for this Department, and herewith submit a copy of his reply, and of the tabular statement which accompanied it. This table shows the aggregate amount of increase in each State and Territory cast upon the letter postages received in the quarter ending September 30, 1853; but as it is proposed to make the change of rates commence on the 1st of April, 1853, he has estimated the quarter preceding and the two quarters succeeding the September quarter of that year. This estimate shows that the proposed rates of commission would reduce the revenue; or, what is the same thing, increase the expenditures of the Department for "compensation to postmasters," "clerks for offices," &c., about $302,944. Such would probably be the effect of the proposed change of rates; and it is respectfully submitted, whether the public interest really requires the expenditure of so large a sum upon the post offices, at a time when large additions to the mail facilities are demanded in all parts of the country, and more especially in the newly settled States and Territories.

There are now more than twenty-three thousand post offices in the United States, of which number it is believed that not less than ten thousand are held rather for the incidental advantages they afford than for any profit accruing directly to the incumbents; some thousands more are held by persons who are now content with the direct profit and the incidental advantages derived; many more are sought with avidity because the compensation is ample for the labor and attention bestowed, and but a few, comparatively, make an inadequate return for the services and responsibility of the incumbents. These last consist chiefly of distributing offices situated at points where the commissions on delivery matter are insufficient to aid in compensating the additional labor imposed by the duties of distribution.

But the proposed scale of commissions, while it increases the compensation of thousands of postmasters who neither need nor expect it, affords no substantial relief to the distributing offices, where the labors performed are most onerous, and the services rendered are of the utmost importance to our mail system. Therefore, to give efficiency to offices of this class, I would respectfully submit that it can be done most readily and economically by restoring to the Postmaster General the power given him by the sixth section of the act of 3d March, 1851, so far as to authorize him to make allowances from the 1st April, 1853, to distributing offices, sufficient to cover their reasonable and necessary expenses; provided the allowances so made shall not exceed, by twenty per cent., the respective amounts allowed for like purposes in any previous year, at the same offices.

The Auditor estimates that the sum of $35,000 per annum would cover all the additional allowances necessary to be made to the distributing offices; but if they should reach $35,000 a year, still that mode of relieving them, in my opinion, be preferable on the score of economy, to any general increase of the rates of commission.

There is yet another class of offices which require the aid of Congress, called separating offices, which perform service second in importance only to the distributing offices. They are situated at the termini or diverging points of many mail routes, and they overhaul the mails and separate and bag the matter for the different diverging routes. Many of these offices are inadequately compensated, and, therefore, I would commend the subject to your attention, suggesting that the power to make additional compensation to such offices might be conferred, with the same limitation as in the case of distributing offices. It will be seen that the Auditor estimates that $20,000 per annum will be sufficient to relieve offices of this class.

I deem it my duty to use the present occasion to bring to your notice the fact that the compensation of the postmasters at the small offices was considerably reduced by the operation of that provision of the "Act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage,' &c., approved August 30, 1852, which declares that, 'When the postage upon any newspaper or periodical is paid quarterly or yearly in advance at the office where the said periodical or newspaper is delivered, or is paid yearly or quarterly in advance at the office where the same is mailed, and evidence of such payment is furnished to the office of delivery in such manner as the Post Office Department shall, by general regulations, prescribe, one half said rates only shall be charged.' This discount of fifty per cent. allowed for prepayment, inures chiefly to the benefit of the postmasters in the large towns and cities, where the prepayment is commonly made, and the country postmasters have to deliver the papers and periodicals without any compensation.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, yours,

JAMES CAMPBELL, Postmaster General.

Hon. ENSON B. OLDS, Chairman Committee Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to do me the favor to read, in this connection, the estimates of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, referred to in the communication of the Postmaster General:

AUDITOR'S OFFICE, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, }
February 15, 1854.

SIR: In answer to the interrogatories proposed in your letter of the 14th instant, I have the honor to state—

1st. That if, instead of the commissions now allowed upon letter postage, "the proposed rates" should be substituted, from and after the 1st April, 1853, the probable effect would be to decrease the revenue for the year ending 31st March, 1854, about $300,000.

For the basis of this estimate you are respectfully referred to the accompanying statement marked A.*

The total amount of letter postage for the Quarter ending 30th June, 1853, was, $1,121,679 19
Quarter ending 30th September, 1853, was, $1,139,564 41
Estimated for 31st December, 1853, was, $1,159,000 00
Estimated for 31st March, 1854, was, $1,180,000 00
$4,600,243 60

Taking, then, the additional commissions actually ascertained for quarter ending 30th September, 1853, as the basis of an estimate for the other quarters, the following will be the result:

Quarter ending 30th June, 1853, estimated, $73,819 00
Quarter ending 30th September, 1853, ascertained, $75,078 35
Quarter ending 30th December, 1853, estimated, $76,416 00
Quarter ending 31st March, 1854, estimated, $77,631 00
$302,944 35

2d. The number of accounts subject to resettlement prior to those of the current quarter, should the proposed rates take effect from and after the 1st April, 1853, would be sixty-five thousand and one hundred and sixty-three, and the additional clerk hire to effect this would not exceed the sum of $3,000.

3d. If the sixth section of the act of 3d March, 1853, were repealed, and the sixth section of the act of 3d March, 1851, restored, so far as to give the Postmaster General authority to allow to postmasters at distributing offices, where the commissions are insufficient, such additional amount as might be necessary to defray the reasonable and necessary expenses of their offices, from 1st April, 1853, the probable amount of such allowances, should the present rates continue, would not exceed $25,000 per year; and further, if that class of officers should also be included, where a large amount of labor is expended in separating the mails, I have no doubt that $20,000 additional, judiciously applied, would afford all the relief absolutely necessary. And here, also, allow me to say, that the increase of compensation contemplated by the proposed rates, so far as a certain class of distributing officers are concerned, will be found inadequate to their relief. Take, for instance, St. Louis office, where the commissions for quarter ending 30th June, 1853, were insufficient to pay the incidental expenses—$878 03 And for quarter ending 30th September, 1853..... 742 31

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. F. PHILLIPS.

Hon. JAMES CAMPBELL, Postmaster General.

With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, to the opinion expressed, and the deductions and inferences made by the Postmaster General from the estimates of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, against the passage of the bill under consideration, I beg leave on behalf of myself and my colleagues on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, most respectfully to dissent: and will so far trespass upon the patience of the House, as to notice each particular objection made by the head of the Post Office Department, to the bill reported by the committee.

By this exhibit, Mr. Speaker, the auditor for the Post Office Department, estimates that the bill which I have just reported, will increase the expenditures of the Department $75,035 35 per quarter, or $302,944 per annum.

The Postmaster General very pertinently puts the question, "Whether the public interest really requires the expenditure of so large a sum upon the post offices at a time when large additions to the mail facilities are demanded in all parts of the country, and more especially in the newly-settled States and Territories?"

With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, to the opinion of the Postmaster General, I am utterly at a loss to know what the "demand for increased mail facilities," has to do with the adjustment and graduation of commissions to the postmasters of the offices already established, so that they may receive compensation adequate to the labor performed, and the responsibility incurred; unless, indeed, Congress and the Postmaster General still act upon the hypothesis, that the Post Office Department should be a self-sustaining Department of the Government.

If, Mr. Speaker, we are to return to such a theory, you should apply the pruning hook, not to the postmasters, who are the poorest paid of all classes of Government officials, but to the excrescences which Congress has fastened upon the Post Office Department. If, sir, this branch of our Government is to be a self-sustaining Department, do away immediately with your franking privilege, and let everything which passes through and in the mails of the United States, pay its proper tribute to that Department towards its maintenance. Sir, the friends of cheap postage are constantly pointing us to Great Britain, where the cheap-postage system is in operation, and where the post office department not only sustains itself, but is actually a source of revenue to that Government. But do these gentlemen understand that nothing passes through the mail of Great Britain without paying postage? Do they understand that the Postmaster General of Great Britain, the members of Parliament, the House of Lords, and even the Queen herself, is denied the franking privilege, and must pay postage the same as the humblest subject? Do gentlemen really understand that the free matter which leaves the post office in this city abstracts from the revenues of the Post Office Department a million and a half of dollars annually?

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, if you desire to make the Post Office Department a self-sustaining branch of the Government, do away with the transmission of all free matter through the mail, and by this single operation, you will increase the revenues of the Department more than two and a half millions of dollars annually.

Again, sir, instead of applying the pruning hook to the poor postmasters throughout the country, apply it to the ocean mail steamer service. It is a homely maxim, but nevertheless a true one, that it is poor economy to "stop the leak at the spicket, and leave the waste at the bung-hole."

Sir, you had a contract with E. K. Collins & Co., for the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, at $19,250 the round trip. The last Congress, notwithstanding I thought it my duty as the chairman of the Post Office Committee to inform the House that there were responsible offers before that committee to perform the service at $10,000 the round trip, raised the compensation to $33,000 the trip. Thus voting away, to one single company, consisting, as I am told, mostly of foreign stockholders, needlessly and wantonly, $100,000 more than I am desirous to obtain for these twenty-three thousand postmasters, as an adequate reward for the services which they actually render to the country.

Again, sir, if the Post Office Department is to be made a self-sustaining branch of the Government, instead of applying the pruning hook to the postmasters, apply it to your railroad companies, who, notwithstanding they nearly swallow up the whole revenues of the Department, are, like the daughter of the horse leech, continually crying, "Give! give!!"

But, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as when the bills reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads relative to the railroad and ocean mail steamer service shall come up for consideration, I shall have occasion to dwell more at length upon these abuses, I will not further discuss them at this time.

In refutation of this position taken by the Postmaster General, it is sufficient for me to advert to the fact that Congress, in the act of 3d March, 1851, reducing the postage of mailable matter to its present low rates, distinctly placed upon record its abandonment of the policy of making the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department.

It was then urged, as an argument against the reduction of postage, that you would be compelled to reduce the mail facilities of the country, and cut down the compensation of postmasters, or, otherwise, make the Post Office Department a charge upon the National Treasury.

Now, I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that, in the sixth and seventh sections of the act of the 3d March, 1851, Congress pledged itself that the compensation of postmasters should not be cut down, and the mail facilities of the country should not be reduced, in consequence of the reduction of postages.

The sixth section of that act, as I have already shown, authorized and required the Postmaster General to estimate the compensations of deputy postmasters, by the commissions received by them during the year preceeding the taking effect of that act. Nay, sir, it did not stop at that, but actually allowed an increase of twenty per cent., as shown in the proviso to that section, which is in these words:

"Provided, That the whole amount of commission allowed such postmasters during any year shall not exceed by more than twenty per cent. the amount of commissions at such office for the year ending the 30th June, 1851."

The seventh section of that act is, perhaps, a more explicit abandonment of the policy referred to than is the sixth. It is as follows:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no post office now in existence shall be discontinued, nor shall the mail service on any mail route in any of the States or Territories be discontinued or diminished, in consequence of any diminution of the revenues that may result from this act; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to establish new post offices, and place the mail service on any new mail routes established, or that may hereafter be established, in the same manner as though this act had not passed."

These sections of the act of 3d March, 1851, demonstrate, beyond the possibility of a doubt, the abandonment of the policy of making the Post Office Department a self-sustaining department of the Government. They also demonstrate the pledge of Congress, that the compensation of deputy postmasters should not be reduced by the reduction of postage.

Permit me next to show, sir, that the bill which, by order of the Post Office Committee, I have reported, does not increase the compensation beyond the amount received for the year ending the 30th June, 1851.

That I might be enabled to keep the proposed increase within the limits prescribed by the act of the 3d March, 1851, which I regard and shall consider as the pledge of Congress, given to the deputy postmasters of the country, the Post Office Department, in accordance with my request, has furnished me with the statement which I now send to the Clerk to be read:

Statement of the compensation to Postmasters and Clerks for offices for the years ending June 30, 1850, 1851, 1852, and 1853.

Year ending June 30.	Compensation to Postmasters.	Clerks for offices.	Total.

1851	1,781,686 34	359,098 45	2,140,784 79
1852	1,753,360 34	481,278 88	2,234,639 22
1853	1,821,002 15	506,058 13	2,327,060 28

Statement of compensation to Postmasters and Clerks for offices, quarters ending September 30, 1850, 1851, 1852, and 1853.

Quarter ending 30th September.	Compensation to Postmasters.	Clerks for offices.	Total.
1850	$414,438 56	$91,015 15	$505,453 71
1851	451,765 77	113,154 45	564,920 22
1852	451,348 95	130,308 94	581,657 89
1853	389,054 60	129,693 53	518,748 13

"These sums include the average amount of additional compensation allowed under the sixth section of the act of March 3, 1851.

The first statement exhibits the compensation to postmasters and clerks for two years preceeding and two years succeeding the taking effect of the act of the 3d March, 1851. But inasmuch as it embraces only one quarter, namely, the last quarter of the last year in which postmasters were paid in accordance with their reduced commissions, it is of but little importance.

The second statement is the one to which I desire to call the attention of the House. It exhibits the compensation to deputy postmasters for the first quarter in each of the years named. The quarter ending the 30th September, 1853, being under the operation of the act of the 3d March, 1851, demonstrates the reduction made in the compensation of postmasters by the provisions of that act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read another communication from the Postmaster General, and then we shall be prepared to proceed with our deductions and conclusions:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, March 8, 1854.

MY DEAR SIR: Pursuant to your request, I have the pleasure of giving you below a statement of the number of post offices and postmasters in the United States on the 30th day of June, in the years 1850, 1851, 1852, and 1853.

Yours truly, JAMES CAMPBELL.
Hon. E. B. OLDS, House of Representatives.

June 30, 1850.....	18,417
June 30, 1851.....	19,706
June 30, 1852.....	20,901
June 30, 1853.....	22,320

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, troubling the House with a calculation showing the average compensation to each postmaster for each of the fiscal years embraced in the foregoing statements. These exhibits will be published with my remarks, and thus each gentleman will be furnished with data upon which to make his own calculation.

It will be sufficient for me to show what was the average compensation to each postmaster in one quarter of the year ending the 30th June, 1851, and for a corresponding quarter in the present fiscal year, in order to demonstrate the reduction which has been made by the operation of the law of last Congress—the law complained of, and which the bill now under consideration proposes to remedy.

The estimates given me by the Postmaster General are the quarters ending the 30th September in each year. The compensation to postmasters for the quarter ending the 30th September, 1850, being the fiscal year referred to in the act of the 3d March, 1851, was $414,438 56. The whole number of postmasters that year was eighteen thousand four hundred and seventeen. This would give a compensation to each postmaster of $21 96 per quarter. Take the corresponding quarter of the present fiscal year, and the compensation to postmasters for the quarter ending the 30th September, 1853, was $389,054 60. The number of postmasters was twenty-two thousand three hundred and twenty. The average compensation was $17 43 per quarter to each postmaster.

Now, sir, add to this the increase made by the bill now under consideration, according to the estimate made by the Auditor of the Post Office Department, and the average compensation would be $20 75 to each postmaster per quarter—being $1 21 per quarter to each postmaster less than the amount allowed by the act of March 3, 1851.

Thus, sir, I have demonstrated beyond all doubt, by the estimates and facts submitted to the Post Office Committee by the Postmaster General himself, that the bill which I have reported, should it become a law, will still leave the average compensation of the deputy postmasters full 12 per cent. below what it was under the act of March 3, 1851.

But I may, perhaps, be told that the bill under consideration proposes to give the Postmaster General power to make still further compensation to the postmasters of distributing and separating post offices, and that, as a consequence, it will vary the computation above submitted, and greatly increase the average.

From the data furnished by the Postmaster General and the Auditor of the Post Office Department, this increased compensation to distributing and separating offices can be brought into the computation and reduced to a certainty.

Both the Postmaster General and the Auditor say that $25,000, or, at the outside, $35,000 for the distributing, and $20,000 for the separating offices, beyond their present compensation, will be amply sufficient for the extra allowances to these two classes of postmasters.

By reference to the estimate of the Auditor, you will perceive that the two and a half per cent. increased commission on distribution at distributing offices—allowed in the bill under consideration—amounts to $6,149 75 per quarter or $24,599 per annum. Deducting this amount from the $55,000, estimated by the Postmaster General and Auditor for the Post Office Department, will leave $30,401 per annum, or $7,600 25 per quarter to be added to the average of $20 75 to each postmaster; this will increase the average to $28 13—provided the bill under consideration becomes a law. This is still an average of nearly one dollar less per quarter than the compensation contemplated by the act of the 3d March, 1851.

Make still another calculation, if you please, sir, and it will show the same result. Under the operation of the act of the 3d March, 1851, the average compensation to the deputy postmasters was $21 96 per quarter, or $87 84 per annum. Under the law of the last Congress, the average compensation was reduced to $17 43 per quarter, or to $69 72 per annum, being an average deduction of $16 12 per annum to each postmaster. There being twenty-three thousand postmasters in the United States, would make the sum total of reduction amount to $370,760.

The bill first agreed upon by the Post Office Committee, the Postmaster General informs us, would increase the pay of all the postmasters $302,944 35. To this amount add the $30,401, the estimated increase at distributing and separating offices, and the sum total of increase will be $333,345 35 cents, being still $37,414 65 cents less than the aggregate compensation to the deputy postmasters would be, if estimated and allowed by the act of the 3d March, 1851.

Now, Mr. Speaker, such are the facts, even upon the estimates and figures given us by the Postmaster General and the Auditor of the Post Office Department. And I desire to put the question to this House, and let their action upon this bill speak the answer: Was the promise made to deputy postmasters by Congress, in the sixth section of the act of the 3d March, 1851, in good faith; or was it a promise "made to the ear to be broken to the hope?"

The Postmaster General, in his communication, says, that of the twenty-three thousand post offices in the country, not less than ten thousand are held rather for the incidental advantages they afford than for any profit accruing directly to the incumbent. Perhaps, sir, it may be true that thousands of men could be found who would be willing to hold these offices for their "incidental advantages." But, for one, I am utterly opposed to any system of compensation for Government offices which looks to the "incidentals" as the reward for a faithful discharge of duty. Perhaps it may be true that the President of the United States could find many men willing to hold the office of Postmaster General for the sake of its "incidental advantages;" but would that be a valid reason why the present most excellent incumbent should be deprived of his $8,000 per annum? Perhaps, sir, the people could find Representatives in Congress willing to hold the station for the sake of its "incidental advantages;" but is that a valid reason why we should all be deprived of our eight dollars per day? Sir, adopt this system, and the American Congress would become as corrupt as the British Parliament, which has long practiced upon the system of "incidental advantages." Sir, we have had, within the last year or two, some beautiful specimens of the "incidental advantages" of political position and official influence, as manifested in the Galphin, the Gardiner, and the Mears frauds, enough, I trust, to satisfy this House that it is not the most economical method of rewarding Government officials.

But, Mr. Speaker, if there is any soundness in such an argument, why has not the Postmaster General recommended the repeal of all commissions to these ten thousand postmasters? If, sir, they "hold these offices rather for the incidental advantages they afford than for any profit accruing directly to the incumbent," why are we paying them any commission at all? If the argument is sufficient to justify this reduction, it is sufficient to justify a repeal of all commission. I repeat, sir, this argument, so far as this bill is concerned, either proves too much, or it proves nothing at all. Discarding, then, the system of "incidental advantages," I put the question home to every gentleman upon this floor: Will these ten thousand postmasters, under the operation of this bill, receive a single farthing from the Government more than they really earn? Will they receive a single dime more than their services are really worth to the Government? If not, sir, let us act upon the good old maxim, "that the laborer is worthy of his hire."

But, Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General himself, has furnished us with an unanswerable argument in favor of this very class of postmasters. In his communication to the Post Office Committee, already read, he says:

"I deem it my duty to use the present occasion to bring to your notice the fact that the compensation of the postmasters at the small offices was considerably reduced by that provision of the act to amend the act entitled an act to reduce and modify the rates of postage, &c., approved August 30, 1852, which declares that 'when the postage upon any newspaper or periodical is paid quarterly, or yearly, in advance, at the office where the said periodical or newspaper is delivered, or is paid yearly or quarterly, in advance, at the office where the same is mailed, and evidence of such payment is furnished to the office of delivery in such manner as the Post Office Department shall, by general regulations, prescribe, one half of said rates only shall be charged.' This discount of fifty per cent., allowed for prepayment, accrues chiefly to the benefit of the postmasters in the large towns and cities, where the prepayment is commonly made, and the country postmasters have to deliver the papers and periodicals without any compensation."

Now, Mr. Speaker, does the Postmaster General suppose that this system of deducting the fifty per cent. for prepayment can be changed? Has he forgotten the clamor raised by the city press and the publishers of periodicals during the last Congress, followed as it was by the efforts of the city Representatives in this Hall for this particular proviso in the law modifying the rates of postage? Sir, you have not forgotten it; the members of the last Congress have not forgotten it, and can fully appreciate the futility of attempting to make any change relative to this deduction for prepayment. I am, therefore, certainly obliged to the Postmaster General for placing in my hands an unanswerable argument in favor of increasing the compensation of the postmasters at the smaller—the country post offices. His reasoning is so irresistible in itself, that I feel that any additional comment of my own would rather tend to weaken than strengthen its force.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Mr. Speaker, after receiving the communication of the Postmaster General, and the estimates of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, came unanimously to the conclusion that they had not proposed a sufficient increase of compensation to the postmasters of distributing and separating offices. The committee are also of the opinion that it is impossible to fix a rate of commission to these two classes of postmasters that will be just and equitable. An office with a large distribution and a small delivery would require a larger commission than an office with a small distribution and a large delivery. Take as an illustration the office at New York, where the delivery is very large. At that office the rates of commission proposed will leave a surplusage to be returned to the general revenue of the Post Office Department, whilst at Chicago, St. Louis, Columbus, and many others, the rates proposed would not afford to the postmasters, after paying rents, clerk hire, &c., a single dollar of compensation. At Columbus, in my own district, the postmaster, after having applied the whole of his commissions to the payment of office rent, clerk hire, and other incidental expenses, finds himself not only minus his own salary, but actually out of pocket about forty dollars per quarter.

I send to the Clerk a letter just handed me by an honorable gentleman from Missouri:

POST OFFICE ST. LOUIS, March 21, 1854.

DEAR SIR: I have had former experience of your kind disposition to attend to the interests of those having no claim upon you as of your constituency, and am thereby induced to ask your assistance in the present case.

When postages were reduced in 1851 it was evident that the then existing commissions to postmasters would not pay salaries and expenses; but as Congress could not then fix upon a proper rate of commissions, it was provided that postmasters should receive every quarter as much as his office paid for the corresponding quarter prior to the 30th June, 1851, with twenty per cent. additional, at the discretion of the Postmaster General.

This law continued in force until the last day of the last session of Congress.

On the 3d March, 1853, an act was passed fixing the commissions of postmasters; and as the Postmaster General construed it, repealing the discretion vested in him by the act of 1851 to allow any additional compensation.

Of the passage of this law I had no notice from the Department or otherwise, and was ignorant of it until I had made my returns for two quarters.

As soon as I came to the knowledge of the fact I went to Washington to see the Postmaster General. I showed him that I had conducted the office with economy, and that my expenses were within the provisions of the act of 1851, and that if my accounts were to be settled under the act of 1853, I would fall behind about $1,400 a quarter, or $5,600 for the year.

The Postmaster General wished me to hold on to the office for the present, and said he would present the subject, which embraced others as well as myself, in his annual report to Congress, and that immediate relief would be afforded.

The Postmaster General redeemed his pledge, and represented that some postmasters not only received no salary, but paid out their own funds to sustain the Department, and asked that authority be given him to settle in such cases on principles of justice and equity.

Several months of the session of Congress has now elapsed, and no bill reported in conformity to the recommendation of the Postmaster General. I feel uneasy under this state of things, and have to call upon my friends to assist me.

If the Missouri delegation will take it in hand, I am safe—the case is a simple and plain one.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ARCHIBALD GAMBLE.

To meet such cases as this, the committee have added the proviso having reference to distributing and separating offices.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have demonstrated that Congress, by the act of the 3d March, 1851, is pledged to restore the compensation of postmasters to something near what it was prior to the reduction which took place in postages consequent upon the passage of that act, and the act of the 30th August, 1852. I think I have also shown, upon the estimates of the Postmaster General, and the Auditor of the Post Office Department, that the bill under consideration will not make the commissions of deputy postmasters as much, by more than twelve per cent., as they were during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1851.

The only question, then, Mr. Speaker, which I consider important to be further presented to the House is this: Is it right and proper in itself that the compensation to deputy postmasters should be so increased as to place them on some kind of equality with other classes of Government officials? Certainly, sir, no class of Government employees perform more arduous and responsible duties; and it is equally certain that no class is so poorly paid. From every section of the Union we hear constant murmuring and dissatisfaction expressed. There is scarcely a member upon this floor but what has been importuned by his constituents to take speedy action upon some measure which shall remedy the evil complained of.

Mr. Speaker, I will thank the Clerk to read the letter which I send to his desk. It is but a specimen of hundreds which I have received from all sections of the Union; and I have no doubt but that nearly every member of this House has in his possession many similar communications:

SHARPTOWN, MD., February 20, 1854.

DEAR SIR: Seeing by the newspapers that you are chairman of the Post Office Committee in the House of Representatives, and I being postmaster at this place, and not understanding some matters as well as I presume you do, I have concluded to write this, in hope that you may be able to give me the required information.

I took charge of the post office here on 2d August last, and among the papers handed over to me by my predecessor, was an act to reduce and modify the rates of postage, &c., in the United States, approved 3d March, 1851, wherein it appears that postmasters were to be allowed the compensation they received for the quarter ending 30th June, 1851; and so, by said act, when I made out my return for the balance of the quarter, I wrote to the Auditor I should retain the whole of the money, as it would not then be in proportion to the pay received for the quarter ending 30th June 1851, as I thought that was the last law passed on the subject of postages and compensation of postmasters. As soon as he received my note he sent me a circular, No. 84, dated 8th of October, 1853, defining the commissions allowed by law to postmasters, which are the same, or very little, "if any," better than they were in 1850, and with more business done now; yet a postmaster's pay does not amount to half what it did previous to the passage of the act above referred to. At that time the business of the office was gradually increasing, and it was to the postmaster's interest to build up the office, by inducing persons to subscribe to newspapers, &c. But now it is the reverse, as the trouble will not pay; as, for instance: the last quarter, ending 31st December, 1853, there were three hundred and ninety Baltimore papers handed out of this office to subscribers, and my commission was only 48½ cents; whereas, there were only three hundred and sixty four Baltimore papers taken at this office on 31st December, 1850, and yet my commission on them was $1.62; and the commission on letters, papers, &c., for the corresponding quarters of 1850 and 1853, will be stated below. You will thus see what a vast difference it makes in our commissions now and then. Besides, there is a considerable more trouble in keeping the accounts, &c., now than formerly; and if a postmaster wishes to be obliging, and give general satisfaction, he will have to open his office after night, although not compelled by law to do so; and it has frequently been the case, since I have had the office, that I have gone and opened it three and four times after night, to hand out papers, &c., to persons living in the country, who could not spare the time to come after them in the day; and that is attended with some expense in the way of oil and matches. Now, if I am only to be allowed fifty per cent. on papers, I shall never undertake to get up another club, unless a specified salary be allowed me. I told a gentleman a few days since that if he wanted a paper he had better send on the full amount to the editor and take one, as I shall do; or, if he chose, he might get up a club, for I would not. The subscriptions of those now taking papers I feel very willing should run out, as the trouble does not pay; more especially, as I advanced the money for several individuals composing the last two clubs, and have not yet been paid. I never will have anything to do with another club, unless I get better pay than I do now.

Now, sir, do tell me whether I am not, by the law above referred to, allowed to retain the whole amount collected, if it does not amount to as much as the commissions did on 30th June, 1851; or if the Department will not allow me at that rate on our final settlement? On your answer determines my holding the office or not. Please answer this at your earliest convenience, and oblige,

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWARD BURFORD, Postmaster.

Non. Doctor OLDS.

Postmaster's commissions for the quarter ending 31st December, 1851, $7 89; quarter ending 31st March, 1852, $9 61; for part of a quarter, beginning on 1st April, and ending 22d May, 1852, $5 14; quarter ending 31st December, 1853, $3 94; for part of a quarter, beginning on 2d August, and ending on 30th September, 1853, $3 50.

It is not the complaint of postmasters alone which reaches us; but the whole community seems to be impressed with a belief, that under our present low postage system, their mail facilities are reduced, and the employees of this Department are too poorly paid to render such accommodations as the public has a right to expect. No subject under the control and supervision of Congress affects more directly the interests of all classes and conditions of society, than the mail service of the country. Under existing laws, the postal business is emphatically a Government monopoly; consequently, great care should be taken to render this branch of the public service popular with the people, by keeping pace with their reasonable demands and expectations, and by giving an adequate compensation to those whose time and patience are constantly taxed in the discharge of the duties of more than twenty-three thousand post offices throughout the thirty-one States and the Territories of this Union.

Justice to the whole community, as well as to these twenty-three thousand postmasters, and a proper regard to the importance and dignity of labor, demand, as I conceive, the speedy passage of the bill under consideration.

The positions, Mr. Speaker, which, during my brief hour, I have attempted to elaborate, and which, as I conceive, I have established beyond all controversy, are—

First. That Congress, in the act of 3d March, 1851, pledged the faith of this Government that the reduction in postage should not lead to a reduction in the compensation to postmasters.

Second. That in consequence of the reduction of postage, the labor of deputy postmasters has been increased fully three-fold.

Third. That by the act of the 3d March, 1853, the compensation of deputy postmasters has been reduced more than thirty-five per cent.

Fourth. That the bill which, by the direction of the Post Office Committee, I have presented for the consideration of this House, does not increase the compensation of deputy postmasters beyond what they are honestly entitled to receive as an equivalent for the labor they actually perform, and is at least twelve per cent. below the commission contemplated in the pledge of Congress, given them in the sixth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1851.

Mr. Speaker, have I not made out such a case as calls upon the justice and the magnanimity of this Congress for speedy action? Shall it be said that, with an overflowing Treasury, and at a time when, in consequence of the greatly increased cost of living, we have raised the salary of all the heads of Departments, and are about to increase the pay of the various government clerks, that we shall break our promise to these deputy postmasters, and require them to labor and toil without an adequate compensation, for fear, peradventure, the Post Office Department may become a charge upon the National Treasury? I cannot, I will not believe that Congress will subject itself to the odium that must follow such a policy.

Let me say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, and as obviating any necessity for delay, that the language of the bill under consideration is precisely the language used in existing laws upon this subject. The only change is in the rate of commission, and in the proviso relative to distributing and separating offices. I hope, sir, the bill may at once receive the favorable consideration of this House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman—the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—a question. I desire to know if this bill proposes to go back in its operation to postmasters who are out of office? I ask the question, because I did not understand what was the fact upon this point when the bill was read.

Mr. OLDS. It is to take effect from the commencement of the next fiscal quarter; but in distributing offices, where actual losses have occurred, it allows the Postmaster General to go back to the first of March last, and to make up such losses.

Mr. HOUSTON. I also desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question in connection with this bill. Does he propose to alter the rates of postage in any manner so as to increase the revenues of the Post Office Department so as to make up the deficiency which this bill will create?

Mr. OLDS. I will answer the gentleman. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have reported a bill requiring the postage upon letters, in all cases, to be prepaid. We have not, it is true, made any provision for changing the rates of postage; but when that bill comes up for consideration, it will be in the power of any gentleman to propose any change in the rates of postage which he may think proper. And I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, that when that bill comes up for consideration, if he will introduce a proposition increasing the postage on letters from three to five cents, it will meet my most hearty approbation, and shall have my support.

I have shown conclusively to the House that five and ten cents are the revenue point in respect to postage on letters—that when the rates were higher than that, the amount of revenue derived was less; that when the rate was reduced below that point the amount of revenue derived was also less; and that five cents is the point which will produce the highest revenue point.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will my friend from Ohio state the difference between the receipts into the Post Office Department and the expenditures of that Department; in other words, will he inform me how much the General Treasury has to pay for the Post Office Department?

Mr. OLDS. I will answer the gentleman. Excluding the amount paid to the Collins line of ocean mail steamers, and excluding the amount paid to the California ocean mail steamers, which do not properly come within the expenditures of the Post Office Department, the deficiency is still above $2,000,000 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio as saying that he leaves out the amount paid to these ocean mail steamers, as not properly coming out of the revenues of the Post Office Department?

Mr. OLDS. As leaving out only those now charged to the revenue of the Department. If I understand correctly, the Collins and Law & Aspinwall lines of steamers are not a charge on the revenue of the Post Office Department, but are paid out of the Treasury of the United States, while the Bremen and other lines are a charge on it.

Mr. HOUSTON. How much charge are the Collins and the other lines? I believe a million and a quarter.

Mr. OLDS. The Collins line costs $858,000 per annum, and the Law & Aspinwall line $638,000 per annum; in all, more than a million and a half of dollars.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I understand the sum of the statement of my friend from Ohio to be, that the general Treasury is supplying, at this time, a deficiency of about $3,500,000 in the revenue of the Post Office Department, including all the ocean mail service.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman undertakes to make the ocean mail service a charge on the Department, which Congress never contemplated. The very cry raised by gentlemen in favor of these ocean mail steamers was, that they were to be war vessels in case of war; and it was a mere pretense to put them into the carrying of the mail. And if you will do away with your ocean mail steamers, and open the carrying of the ocean mails to contracts, as you do your land service, I venture the prediction that, instead of paying $33,000 the round trip, you can have it made for less than $10,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he has a bill proposing some modifications in relation to postage. Would it not be in order for the gentleman to move the substance of the bill in connection with this one, as it is now up, so that we may have a guarantee it will be acted on at this session of Congress, and that this great deficiency between the revenue and the expenditures of the Department shall be relieved? If we go on in this way; if we go on tinkering—for I must regard it as nothing else—if we go on unkerking the postage of the country as we have been doing for a few years, in a short time you will have your whole Post Office Department a charge on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. OLDS. I will say, for the information of the gentleman from Alabama, that the bill to which he has referred stands high on the Calendar, and will undoubtedly be reached in time to be acted on at this session of Congress; and I do not choose, for one, to bring all the prejudices that will be brought to bear against the proposition to raise the postage, to bear against the bill for paying the postmasters a proper compensation; neither do I see that the two are at all connected. You have an overflowing Treasury. You require these postmasters to labor for nought, nay, absolutely to pay out of their own pockets the expenses of their post offices, and while you have this overflowing Treasury. Do justice to them; pay them a reasonable compensation, and then raise your postage, and you will have my approbation to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I have but a few more words to say in relation to this matter; and I desire, unless some gentleman proposes to ask me a question in reference to the bill, to call for the previous question, and put the bill on its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was not the gentleman's time out before he called for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It was not out for one minute.

Mr. OLDS. I was cautious, and kept my eye on the clock.

Mr. JONES. I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his call for the previous question?

[Cries of "No!"]

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. JONES. I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his call for the previous question so that I may make a few remarks.

Mr. OLDS. If the gentleman will promise to renew the call I will; but not otherwise.

Mr. JONES. I promise to do so.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. We have not seen the bill, and know nothing about it.

Mr. OLDS. The bill was published in the Evening Star two days ago.

Mr. WALSH. We are not all star-gazers. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. Did the gentleman from Georgia move to lay the bill upon the table?

Mr. SEWARD. I did.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman withdraw it, as the call for the previous question has been withdrawn?

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions to report a bill in connection with it to increase the postages of the country so as to meet the expenditures of the Post Office Department.

I have no idea that this House, from the feeling which has been manifested here, will sustain my motion; but I will vote against this bill in its present shape, if I stand alone.

Mr. OLDS. I expected you would.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and the gentleman should do it also.

Mr. OLDS. No, he should not.

Mr. JONES. The reduction of the postage commenced in 1845, and we put it at five and ten cents upon a single letter. The first effect of that was that the receipts fell below the amount necessary to defray the current expenses of the Department. After a year or two, however, the receipts about came up to the wants of the Department. Then a further reduction was made; and from that time to this, the mail service has been principally quartered upon the Treasury of the country, and consequently on the tax-payers, and not upon those who are particularly benefited by that service.

Now, sir, the Postmaster General, in his report at the commencement of the present session of Congress, shows that the whole number of post offices in the United States at the close of the last fiscal year ending June 30th, 1853, was 22,320. Of that number 255 are of the highest class, the postmasters at which are appointed by the President. Out of the 23,000 post offices in the United States which the gentleman from Ohio has referred to, and the postmasters at which, he says, are clamoring here for an increase of compensation, but 255 of them are of what is considered by the Department of the first class, or those the postmasters of which are appointed by the President; and I believe the President appoints all postmasters, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, whose compensation annually exceeds $1,000.

Then, sir, by the operation of the bill which has been reported this morning and read at the desk, you give sixty per cent. upon the first $100 per quarter; that leaves $40 for the Department. Upon the next $300 you give fifty per cent.; and the compensation, if the amount should be $400 per quarter, will be $210 per quarter to the postmaster, and $190 to the Post Office Department; and this rate of compensation will cover all the post offices in the country, except those two hundred and fifty-five, the postmasters of which are appointed by the President. Thus you give more than one half of all the postages of the country for the collection of them.

Now, sir, if you will increase the postages so as to supply this deficit of $2,000,000, and let the compensation of postmasters stand at what it is at present, you will increase their commission more by that operation than you will by passing this bill merely for the increase of compensation without touching the postages. For one, I believe it would be much better if you just give postmasters, at all offices under $500 a year, the entire receipts of their offices, and dispense with the immense force we have here to audit, control, and collect these quarterly reports of postmasters throughout the country.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Olds] read some statements of the Postmaster General, to the effect that there were ten thousand postmasters who did not accept their offices for the sake of any emolument to be expected therefrom. I think myself that a reference to the list of post offices and postmasters throughout the country, the receipts of their offices, and the compensation which they receive, will satisfy any gentleman who will take the trouble to make that investigation, that there must be some twelve, perhaps fifteen, thousand out of the twenty-three thousand postmasters, who do not accept their offices for the pay or emolument which they are to receive. Why, I suppose that there are more than ten thousand postmasters whose compensation cannot exceed fifty dollars per year. Does any man suppose that any postmaster who seeks the office, and desires the appointment of postmaster, with the expectation of attending to the duties appertaining to such appointment, makes such application for the sake of getting the sum of fifty dollars per annum? There are thousands of postmasters throughout the country whose annual compensation, I doubt not, is under ten dollars per annum. I know that many of these postmasters, living in small villages, or who keep country stores or public houses in some neighborhood in the country accept the appointment in many instances as a mere accommodation to the neighborhood; and others accept it for that reason, and the fact combined, that it may draw some custom to the particular business in which they are engaged. Doubtless, from these motives, thousands upon thousands of these post offices, I think, are accepted.

I did not design, when I rose, to detain the House long in the remarks I intended to make, and therefore I will hasten to a conclusion. The Postmaster General tells us that the expenses of the Department were $7,982,756 59; that the receipts were $5,940,724 70. It appears from the foregoing statement, that the gross revenue for the year ending the 30th June, 1853, fell short of the expenditure for that year by the sum of $2,042,031 89. This statement does not include mail transportation in ocean steamers. We see, then, here a deficit in this branch of the service of over $2,000,000, as reported by the head of the Department; which, I think, should not be made a burden upon the Treasury.

The gentleman from the Post Office Committee, who reported this bill, says that if we wish to relieve the Department, and to make the revenues something like equal to the expenditures, we had better repeal the laws granting the franking privilege. Stop that, he says—confidently expressing the opinion that if you will do that, you will increase the revenue of the Department some $2,000,000.

Mr. OLDS. Two millions and a half.

Mr. JONES. Does that gentleman himself believe that such would be the effect? Is there a reasonable man in this country, understanding the matter, who could for a moment believe it? From whence, Mr. Speaker, does the mass of this free matter start? Sir, from this very building. It is from this building that that immense mass of free matter is started under which your mails groan throughout the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, that free matter goes mostly to those who pay these $2,000,000 of deficit, without using your mails otherwise to very great extent. Your mail facilities at this time are made subservient to the interests of the cities of this country, where the cry of cheap postage was raised and heralded to this Capitol. This free matter, transmitted from this Capitol, goes to the farmers and other inhabitants throughout the country, who pay these $2,000,000 of excess which your postage fails to raise. They themselves get this free matter.

But, Mr. Speaker, let me ask another question; let me ask the gentleman from Ohio how he will get these $2,000,000 from the free matter? Would that gentleman vote to print a hundred thousand copies of trashy Patent Office Reports, and send them through the mails throughout the country, paying the postage on them himself? I take it for granted that there are but few gentlemen here who would do it. And I also take it for granted that but few of your Patent Office Reports would be taken from the post office if the man to whom they are sent had to pay the postage on receiving them. You might, perhaps, for once catch a man doing such a thing, but you would hardly ever catch the same man a second time paying the postage on such reports; and in all probability—as it is suggested to me—when you had fooled him once, and made him pay the postage for such trash, you would not receive his vote again.

I also ask the gentleman from Ohio if he would be printing thousands of these census reports if he had to pay for the postage on their transmission through the country? No, sir; and one of the greatest advantages, in my opinion, that would result to the country from the repeal of the franking privilege would be to correct the enormous abuses to which the Congress of the United States have run, in directing the printing of public documents, many of which I conceive are of little or no value. It is said that it is proper to publish these reports for the purpose of enlightening the people on the several matters discussed in them. Enlightening the people! Why, sir, a great many of the articles published in these reports are written by men who know nothing of the subjects on which they write. These articles are comprised within the reports, and made to be part and parcel of them, by men who know just as little about the subjects they treat of, as the persons who wrote them. They are sent out through the country; and when read by plain practical men who understand the subject practically, it is seen that in many cases the authors of them knew nothing of the subject on which they wrote.

I will not detain the House longer, but conclude with the expression of a hope that the motion which I have made may be sustained; that the bill will be recommended to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions to report an amendment so increasing the rate of postage as to meet the expenses of the Post Office Department. In doing that, you will not only be doing an act of justice to the whole country, but you will thereby increase the compensation of deputy postmasters to a greater amount than you will do by the passage of this bill as it is.

In accordance with the promise I made to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] I move the previous question.

Mr. UPHAM. Will the gentleman withdraw the call for a single moment?

Mr. JONES. I have not the control of the motion, but it belongs to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. UPHAM. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make a word or two of explanation?

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw it if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. UPHAM. I apprehend that the question of the franking privilege is not at present before the House. If any gentleman feels disposed to introduce a bill to do away with the franking privilege, he can do so. The question before us relates to the proper, just, and equitable compensation to be made to the postmasters of the country.

In illustration of the bill which the committee have reported, I beg leave to present to the House one or two additional considerations. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, of which, sir, I am an humble member, have taken into consideration, and are at present maturing, a bill for separating, in the accounts of the Post Office Department, the expenses incurred through the operation of the franking privilege, and making those expenses chargeable to the legislative and other departments of the Government, for the benefit of which they are incurred. As the member of the committee to whom that subject is referred [Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi] is not present in his seat, I feel it is proper for me to make these statements.

I would further state to the House that the Postmaster General has been, for a month past, so keeping his accounts as to be able to inform us what would be the effect, if such an arrangement should be made. And, so far as information is now before the committee, I feel confident in making the assertion, that it will be found, if postage were charged upon matter which now goes through the office free, that the legitimate correspondence of the whole country sustains itself, on the land and on the ocean.

At any rate, until the information of which I have been speaking, and which is not yet matured, comes before us, it seems to me it would be premature for us to act upon this bill under the influence of any such arguments, relating to the franking privilege, as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has adduced.

This bill is designed to relieve that class of public officers whose compensation is small. It is not for the benefit of those who hold valuable offices, but for the benefit of the humble village postmasters of the country, and it is also designed to secure from ruinous loss those postmasters who are situated at distributing points. It is a bill founded in justice and equity, and will commend itself, the more it is considered, to the sense of justice of the members of this House. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order while the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. OLDS. I will withdraw it, to enable the gentleman from Tennessee to ask his question.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman if I understood him rightly in saying that he had introduced a bill raising the rates of postage upon letters from three to five cents?

Mr. OLDS. No, sir. I will state to the gentleman what I did say. I stated that we had introduced a bill requiring that the postage on all letters should be prepaid, but leaving the rate upon prepaid letters the same as it is now, three cents. This bill has passed our committee, and is before the House. It is high upon the Calendar, and when it comes up for consideration then will be the time for testing the sense of the House upon the question of raising the rates of postage, and not upon this bill; with which it has nothing whatever to do.

Mr. JONES. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman one question further. The gentleman says he would be in favor of raising the rates of postage from three to four cents, and that a bill will soon come up where such a proposition may be adopted. Now, if the House agree to such a proposition will not the rates of charges allowed to postmasters in this bill be too high?

Mr. OLDS. It is certainly a very difficult part for me to perform, if I am to make provision for what the action of Congress may be in future. I will however say, that from the expression of the country, and from the expression of opinion upon the part of members of Congress in the year 1851, in 1852, and in 1853, I have no more hope of being able to get the rates of postage raised upon letters and newspapers, than I have that we can fly. I hope it may not be so. My own sense of right is, that these rates should be raised; but I repeat, that I do not believe the House are of the same opinion; and I do not wish to have the success of this bill endangered by connecting it with any such measure. When that bill comes up, let it stand upon its own merits; as I desire that this bill shall stand upon its own merits.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman is in favor of increasing the rates of postage from three to five cents, I do not see why he should not allow that proposition to come in with this. If there is a provision for increasing the revenue of the Department, that may be an inducement for members to vote for an increase of the compensation of postmasters.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his motion to commit the bill, I have in my hands a bill which was matured by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which, with some modifications, I propose to offer as an amendment. It provides, as modified, for raising the rates of postage to five cents. I propose to offer it as an additional section to this bill. We can then test the sense of the House as to whether they are willing that it should be done.

Now, sir, the bill before the House proposes not to remedy the defects which exist in relation to the revenue derivable from postages, but it proposes to do an act of justice to those who are concerned in administering the post office laws; and in doing that act of justice, it proposes to abstract from the revenues of the Department, which are already too small. No gentleman representing any district in the interior can now go to the Post Office Department and get any satisfaction that the mail facilities in his district shall be continued; and the general impression among those who are administering the laws of the Department is, that your mail service is to be reduced and brought down to a one-horse establishment. That will be the effect under the existing laws, if the matter is suffered to go on as it now does.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Ohio—I ask gentlemen representing districts which are to be cut down in this manner, whether they are performing an act of justice to those administering the laws of the Department, to let the occasion pass by which they may, if they choose, so regulate the rates of postage as to secure to all parts of the country the continuance of proper mail facilities? That is all I propose. It is an act of simple justice, especially to those parts of the country where the mail facilities now are meager. The effect of this bill will be to produce a large deficit in the revenues of the Department, without any increase in its receipts; and a still further reduction of the mail facilities of the country will be the inevitable result.

But, sir, I do not wish to take up the time of the House. The bill I have before me is the one reported by the Post Office Committee providing that the postage shall, in all cases, be prepaid. The only alteration I have made is to strike out "three," where it occurs as the rate of postage, and to insert "five." I propose to test the sense of the House upon the subject by offering it as an amendment, and I will not detain the House longer by any further remarks upon it.

Mr. OLDS. I do not withdraw the call for the previous question to allow the introduction of the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be introduced because there is a pending motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to say a single word in reference to the matter. The bill referred to stands high on the Calendar. This is suspension day, and the gentleman from Alabama can move to suspend the rules to make the bill a special order, if he chooses to do so, for to-morrow. I know enough about parliamentary usage, Mr. Speaker, to know that votes of those who are enemies to the bill under consideration might be obtained to place the gentleman's amendment on it for the express purpose of killing it after it was on. Now I propose that each one shall stand on its own merits. It is not in accordance with the very spirit of the rules of the House, which oppose the offering of one bill as an amendment to another. It is in violation of the very spirit of those rules.

If the House, however, differ with me in opinion, and wish to open up this bill to amendments, and run the risk of defeating it, in consequence of such amendments as may be put on it, then let them vote down the call for the previous question, and leave the bill open to just such amendments as gentlemen choose to offer. But I hope that the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will be voted down; and that it will receive the immediate and favorable action of the House. I therefore renew the call for the previous question, and insist on the House being brought to a vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the amendment I presented been received?

The SPEAKER. It has not, there being a motion to recommit pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appealed to the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I supposed that he had done so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] declined to withdraw the call for the previous question, to let the amendment in.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest that the amendment be allowed to come in, and that we may have the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. OLDS. I decline to withdraw the call for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded; and the main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions to amend the same by adding thereto a provision increasing the rates of postage, so as to meet the expenses of the Post Office Department.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the question is not divisible.

The question was then taken; and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. OLDS. I believe I have a right now to say a word by way of explanation. I merely want to say to the House that this bill is in the precise language of the existing law; and that the only change is in the rates.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. If the bill is in the precise language of the existing law, what is the necessity for its passage?

Mr. OLDS. I said there was no change except in the rates.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, having been engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. OLDS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. JONES's motion; and it was disagreed to.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. OLDS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

The title of the bill was then read and confirmed.

Mr. OLDS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

CANAL AROUND THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of land or money for making a canal around the Falls of Niagara.

Mr. NICHOLS. I object.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I merely wish to refer the resolution to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and I move to suspend the rules.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules; and it was decided in the negative, two thirds not voting therefor.

Mr. GREY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the Chair if this is not regular resolution day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it is not.

The resolution offered by Mr. GREY was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives copies of all the correspondence between the Post Office Department, "their special agent" for the State of Alabama, and the postmaster at Montgomery, which has taken place since the 4th of March, 1853, relative to semi-daily mail service in "nine passenger four horse post coaches," or otherwise, on the route numbered 5,502 in Alabama; also, copies of the original contract for that route for the term of four years, ending the 30th June, 1854, together with all the amendments, alterations, privileges, extensions, and restrictions, authorized in regard to it since the "lettings" of 1850; also, a copy of all amendments, alterations, privileges, extensions, or restrictions authorized since that time in regard to that route, including the proposition to "transfer" it and its "acceptance," and the order authorizing it to be made; also to whom and at what annual compensation the daily service was "let" for the two terms of four years, each one ending in 1850, and the other in 1846, on the route which is at present designated as route No. 5,502 in Alabama; also, copies of all correspondence between the Post Office Department and the postmaster at Montgomery, and either or both of the present contractors, as to the time any service on said route, in addition to that required by their original contract, was commenced by them—from what date—how long, and in what manner performed—whether continuously or from the time first commenced, and whether in "nine passenger four horse coaches, or otherwise;" also, copies of all orders allowing the present contractor, extra or additional compensation over and above the $24,000 per annum; to state also, if the agreement or arrangement to transfer that route to the present contractors was or was not made prior to the 30th of June, 1853, and whether they have been regarded and paid as contractors from and after the 30th June, 1853; also, state whether the present contractors are not authorized to send the "mail sacks" of papers, public documents, &c., (the transportation of which belongs to that route, No. 5,502,) on steamboats from Montgomery to Mobile.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced, considered, and adopted.

THE NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker,

I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to present a petition, signed by numerous citizens of Carbondale, Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the Nebraska bill.

Several MEMBERS. I object. Let it be presented under the rule.

Objection having been made, the petition was sent to the Clerk's desk under the rule.

THE MAIL STEAMER CRESCENT CITY.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to present a resolution, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read. It is a resolution of inquiry merely, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to this House (if not incompatible with the public interest, in his opinion) copies of all correspondence that may have taken place between the Government of the United States and that of Spain, in relation to the refusal, by the authorities of the Island of Cuba, some time in the autumn of 1852, to permit the United States mail steamer Crescent City to land the mail or the passengers destined for that island, at Havana.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced, considered, and adopted.

JEFFERSON'S MANUAL, ETC.

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas this House has passed a resolution directing the Clerk to furnish to each of its members a copy of Jefferson's Manual:

Be it resolved, That, instead of purchasing said Manual, the Clerk be directed to cause the same to be printed and bound with "the standing rules and orders for conducting business, &c., in the House of Representatives, and rules of the Senate."

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced, considered, and adopted.

BURNING OF THE MARTHA WASHINGTON

Mr. BLISS. I desire the unanimous consent of the House to the introduction of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested forthwith to communicate to this House any information in his possession, or facts within his knowledge, touching the expediency of an appropriation by Congress to defray the expenses already incurred in prosecuting the persons charged with the burning of the steamboat Martha Washington on the Mississippi river in January, 1852, and to furnish the means for prosecuting said parties to conviction of the crimes of arson and murder, in the county of Phillips, in the State of Arkansas, where they are now in prison awaiting their trial for said crimes, alleged to have been committed by them in and by the burning of said steamboat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to the introduction of the resolution? The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is now before the House.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to accompany it with a few words of explanation.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been introduced by unanimous consent, the rules are suspended, and the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor to make any explanatory remarks he may deem necessary.

Mr. BLISS. The question, Mr. Speaker, may arise in the minds of gentlemen, why this resolution of inquiry was not addressed to the Attorney General rather than to the Secretary of the Treasury? The answer to that is, that the information which is desired is within the possession of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not perhaps within the possession of the Attorney General. The subject to which it relates is one of great importance to the commerce, and to the safety of human life upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and has very much interested the people of all the river States.

Some time in the year 1851 the steamboat Martha Washington, bound from Cincinnati, probably to New Orleans, was burnt upon the Mississippi river, in the county of Phillips, in the State of Arkansas. Sixteen human beings, men, women, and children, were destroyed in that burning. Previous to this occurrence, several steamboats, within a few years, had been destroyed by fire upon the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and although it was suspected that they were destroyed criminally, and that many lives, consequently, had been destroyed by murder committed in the burning of those boats, yet the public could get no information that would justify a criminal prosecution. Finally, through the energy and the intense application to this investigation of a citizen of the State of Ohio, Mr. Burton, facts were elicited to show that there was an extensive combination of men, living, most of them, in the State of Ohio, some of them, perhaps, in the State of Kentucky, who had long practiced the obtaining of policies of insurance from companies located in the different States of the Union, upon cargoes to be shipped. Afterwards they pretendedly shipped such cargoes, but in fact did not do so, and then burned down the vessels upon which the pretended shipments were made, for the purpose of collecting their insurances, and thereby defrauding the insurance companies.

In 1851, after the burning of this steamboat, the Martha Washington, the investigation, as I said before, was commenced, which led to the discovery of this combination. Several individuals who were indicted in the circuit court for the State of Ohio, under the act of Congress, passed, I think, in 1820, for the crime of conspiracy to defraud insurance companies, were arrested at remote places, at an expense of several thousand dollars, by the extreme vigilance and sagacity of the officer to whom I have alluded. After a great deal of labor, and a good deal of expense, they were tried, and their trial was a long one, in the circuit court of the State of Ohio.

By an unexpected accident the Government was prevented from giving all its evidence to the jury. It is well understood that a complete case for conviction was made out by the proof; but by an extraordinary maneuver of the able counsel on the part of the defendant, the rebutting proof to the proof introduced by the defense was prevented from being brought into court, so that that which was necessary in rebuttal to make the case clear for conviction was excluded, and in consequence the defendants were, after some time spent by the jury in consultation, acquitted.

The investigation, however, disclosed enough, in the opinion of the eminent counsel who are retained for the prosecution, to show that they were guilty of crime; and not only of the crime with which they were charged, but that they were guilty of that of burning the vessel, and of murder by occasioning the loss of those sixteen lives.

These individuals have now, at great expense, all been arrested since their acquittal at Columbus, Ohio. They are now in prison in Philips county, the locality in which the crime was committed. But the county of Philips is not able to sustain the expenses of prosecuting these men and although the evidence is clear against them, and though they are now in prison awaiting their trial, or rather awaiting their preliminary examination, which is to commence the 17th of this month, yet it is well understood that without some aid from the Government to enable them to proceed with the trial, the men will be discharged.

Now, I know it is regarded, in the Executive Department, as highly important to the interests of western commerce, as well as to the protection of human life and property upon our rivers, that this investigation should be carried out to the result of a verdict. The Secretary of the Treasury, owing, perhaps, to the locality of his residence, and owing to many circumstances which it is not necessary now to mention, is possessed of information which would be valuable to enlighten a committee of this House as to the duty they should perform in the premises; and if this resolution is passed, it will be instantaneously and cheerfully responded to.

A MEMBER. The House will pass the resolution.

Mr. BLISS. A gentleman near me says the House will pass the resolution. I have no doubt that they will; and there is, therefore, no need of my taking up more of their time in explanation.

The question was put, and the resolution adopted.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. DENT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, for the purpose of reference. I ask that it may be read by its title for information.

It was read by its title, as follows:

A bill to be entitled an act to amend an act passed the 28th of September, 1850.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I want to know what that act of September, 1850, was. I ask that the Clerk read enough of the bill to enlighten us upon that point.

The Clerk read a portion of the bill. It is to amend an act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States.

No objection being made, the bill was accordingly introduced, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the deficiency bill, which has just come from the Senate, with amendments, may be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and, with the amendments, ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, the Speaker announced that the order was made.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] whether it would not be as well to refer the deficiency bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Unless the House shall consent to let the Committee of Ways and Means report it back when that Committee have acted on the Senate amendments, it may be kept in our desks for months. I throw out the suggestion so that the House, if it desire to send the bill elsewhere than to the Committee of Ways and Means, may do so.

The SPEAKER. The bill, as the Chair understood, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have made no proposition. I merely threw out a suggestion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. It is so referred.

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CHANDLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill to allow parties in equity, of less than the whole number of claimants, to sue for their share of a common fund.

Mr. HENN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House the inspection report of Colonel S. H. Long, of December 30, 1853, and such other communications as may have been made by him in reference to the improvement of western rivers, since the passage of the act of August 30, 1852; and also a copy of Lieutenant Warren's report of his operations on the Des Moines and Rock River Rapids, in the Mississippi river, together with any maps, charts, or diagrams of surveys made by the last named officer during the last year.

Mr. WELLS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are hereby instructed to report a bill reducing ocean postage to a uniform rate of ten cents each on letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. WELLS. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the unanimous consent to present a memorial in reference to the civil superintendency of armories.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, under the instruction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read the bill twice by its title, as follows:

A bill to repeal part of an act entitled "An act to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. PERKINS. I would like the House to have that bill put upon its passage at once. It simply repeals the tax of twenty-five cents heretofore levied at the office of the Secretary of State for the authentication of any document. It has been a source of much annoyance to the members of the House having to pay twenty-five cents, in getting documents authenticated, for the signature of the Secretary of State. It is the desire of the Department, and the wish of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that this bill shall be passed, and I hope it will be put upon its passage immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Let it be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be, and the same is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of joint resolution No. 16, being "A joint resolution manifesting the sense of Congress towards the officers and seamen of the vessels, and others engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco, from perishing with the wreck of that vessel," and that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR, of Ohio, and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The tellers took their places; and, before reporting any result,

Mr. TAYLOR said: There must be some misunderstanding here; for many gentlemen are under the impression that they are voting upon a call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the motion otherwise, and stated the question as he understood it, with the assent of the House; and, in his opinion, it is now too late to modify the form of the question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I announced distinctly that I wished tellers upon the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] asks that the question last put be restated. If there be unanimous consent, the question will be stated in the form desired by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LETCHER. I object; the yeas and nays have been refused once.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause negotiations to be opened with the Government of Great Britain with a view of ascertaining upon what condition that Government will consent to the annexation of the Canadas to the United States of America.

Objection was made.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution just read; and upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. DEAN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] to accept an amendment to insert the words "and Cuba" after the words "the Canadas."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio modify his resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I cannot accept the amendment, for you are a little ahead of me on the Cuba question now.

Mr. FARLEY. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether, if the House decide to suspend the rules, he will accept an amendment, looking also to the acquisition of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly I will.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules; and there were—yeas 29, nays 119; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Belcher, Bliss, Brocock, Campbell, Carpenter, Cook, Corwin, Farley, Flagler, Grow, Harrison, Knox, Lane, Macdonald, Mace, Matteson, Nichols, Parker, Pratt, Pringle, Russell, Sampson, Upham, Wade, Walbridge, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Benton, Bissell, Boyce, Rugg, Caruthers, Caskey, Chastain, Christian, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eastman, Edgerton, Elliott, Ellison, Etheridge, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Fuller, Goode, Goodrich, Grey, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hill, Houston, Howe, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Latham, Letcher, Lindley, Lindsley, Mc-

Mullin, McQueen, Maxwell, May, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Preston, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Sabin, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Vail, Vansant, Walsh, Warren, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—118.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, by unanimous consent of the House, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to transmit to this House copies of the correspondence not now communicated of the United States legation at Constantinople and the United States Consul at Smyrna with Captain Ingraham, the Government of Austria, and of this Government, together with instructions from this Government given to their agents abroad touching the seizure and rescue of Martin Kosza, and the terms and conditions by which he was liberated and sent to this country.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution under instructions by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to cause to be prepared and printed for the use of the House, a history of the claim, and a full report of the trial of Dr. George A. Gardiner, upon the charge for false swearing, in the criminal court for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

Mr. STANTON. I move then to suspend the rules to admit the resolution.

The question was then taken; and the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present certain resolutions of the Mechanics' Institute of New York. I wish to know, if objection be made, whether I can present them under the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has a right to present them under the rule.

They were accordingly sent to the Clerk's desk under the rule.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William McCabe; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to promote Commander Duncan N. Ingraham to the rank of captain in the Navy of the United States, and that the Secretary of the Navy be also requested to tender the command of one of the vessels authorized by the bill adding six steamers to the naval forces, which passed the House on the 31st of March, to Commander Duncan N. Ingraham when such vessel may be ready for service.

Mr. LETCHER objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, to allow me to introduce the resolution just read.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; which was agreed to.

The House thereupon, at three o'clock, p. m., adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a private bill this morning for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Watson, deceased. It is for the benefit of a widow lady who is detained in the city, as I understand, at a great deal of expense and trouble to herself. She is very desirous of having the bill passed immediately. I will state to the Senate, in a word, that the Government has a claim upon a house and lot of hers, and she asks that this cloud, as it were, may be taken off her title, so that she may be able to sell her property and go away. I think the reading of the report, if the Senate will allow the bill to be taken up, will show that it ought to be passed at once.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Solicitor of the Treasury to cause to be executed, on the part of the United States, a full release and acquittance of their claim against Joseph Watson, as one of the sureties of Henry Ashton, late marshal of the District of Columbia, and that the property in the city of Washington, at present held in trust as security for the payment of the claim, be reconveyed to his legal representatives free, and discharged from all such encumbrance, if they release their claim against the United States for services rendered by Watson, as Indian agent in the Territory of Michigan.

Watson preferred a claim against the Government. The services for which he asked compensation were rendered and sanctioned by the head of the territorial government of Michigan, but as they were performed without any provision by law regulating the amount to be allowed for them, the difficulty appears to have been to ascertain their exact value. These services seem to have extended from the year 1806 up to 1812, making six years, during which Watson performed, when required to do so, the duties of superintendent and storekeeper, for which he received no fair remuneration. In view of the difficulty above referred to, the committee being desirous to do justice between the Government and the claimant, deemed it proper to consider his claim with reference to an outstanding liability on his part as one of the securities of Henry Ashton, late marshal of the District of Columbia.

It appears, from an extract from the docket of the Solicitor of the Treasury, that at the November term, 1839, a verdict was rendered in the United States district court for the District of Columbia, in the case of James Williams, one of the six sureties of Henry Ashton, in favor of the United States for $8,279 25. It further appears, from a letter from the chief clerk of the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, that in the year 1842, the representatives of Watson made an arrangement with the Secretary of the Treasury, by which his indebtedness to the United States, as one of the sureties of Ashton, was secured to the satisfaction of the Government, and that the debt so secured amounted to about $1,375, for which a deed of trust on real estate in this city was executed by them. From a statement made to Mr. Baldwin, on behalf of the Committee of Claims of the United States Senate, it appears that of the appropriations made for the contingent expenses of the Territory of Michigan during the years 1806, '7, '8, '9, '10, '11, and 1812, there remained in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1813, a balance of $1,050, and that no part of the appropriations appears "to have been made on account of the Indian Department, or to Joseph Watson."

Taking into consideration the circumstances in which the liability on the part of Joseph Watson had its origin, and the fact, admitted upon all sides, that the services for which compensation is at present demanded were actually rendered, but not paid for, whilst a balance of $1,050 of the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Territory of Michigan, nearly the amount of the liability, remained in the Treasury, the committee think it just that the one should be regarded as an offset against the other. The indebtedness of Watson, for which the property of his representatives is held bound, originated in an act of kindness on his part, from which neither he nor his representatives have ever derived any benefit; and it would seem nothing more than equitable that his services, faithfully rendered, should be received in discharge of that indebtedness. If his appointment had been under a law of Congress, there could have been no difficulty in allowing his salary in discharge of the claim against him as surety of Henry Ashton. The Hon. Lewis Cass, who succeeded, at the end of the war of 1812, to the duties of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, has stated, in a letter on file among the papers, that the office which the petitioner held "was essential to the public service—that the duties were ably and zealously performed;" and "that it was impossible for the Superintendent to discharge personally the various duties required of him by law; and, in point of fact, he always understood that a large portion of them was discharged by Colonel Watson."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Southboro', Massachusetts, remonstrating against any act of Congress, in the organization of Nebraska, which shall permit the introduction of slavery into territory from which it was excluded by the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition signed by women of New England, praying Congress to refrain from legalizing slavery in the Territory of Nebraska; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a petition of citizens of Baskinridge, Somerset county, New Jersey, praying Congress to enact such laws as will tend to secure religious freedom to American citizens residing or traveling abroad; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WELLER presented a memorial of the officers of the United States Army, stationed at Fort Yuma, California, praying an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of inhabitants of the city of Portland, Maine, praying that the present rates of ocean postage may be reduced to the uniform charge of two cents; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition signed by legal voters in the town of Sanford, county of York, Maine, protesting against the passage of what is known as the "Nebraska bill," by which it is proposed to legalize slavery in the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Butler county, Ohio, praying that the public lands may be granted in limited quantities to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of the faculty of Mississippi College, praying that a township of land may be granted to each incorporated college or university in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of Moses Noble, agent for the owners of certain fishing vessels, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to adjust the claims of the owners thereof, to fishing bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Noot; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Nancy Bowen be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. MASON. The morning business, I believe, is through. I move, therefore, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. EVANS. I do not intend to interfere with the Senator from Virginia, but there is a bill on the table—

Mr. MASON. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from South Carolina, but I know the bill which he proposes to take up. I suppose it is the one in reference to revolutionary claims.

Mr. EVANS. I do not propose to take it up at this time; but I rise to say that I should be gratified if some time could be fixed for its consideration. I move, if it be in order, that it be made the special order for one hour to-morrow morning. I do not wish to interfere with the Executive business.

Mr. MASON. As far as I am concerned personally, I should have no objection to that; but I would suggest to the Senator, that by next week we shall probably have disposed of the business in Executive session; and if he will allow his bill to go over until that time, he will have an opportunity to have it disposed of then. I think the bill will engender debate, and probably protracted debate. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator that it would be better, perhaps, to let it lie over until next week.

Mr. EVANS. Then I move to take up the bill to which I refer, for the purpose of making it the special order for next Monday.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill "to provide for the final settlement of the claims of the officers of the Revolutionary Army, and of the widows and orphan children of those who died in the service."

On motion by Mr. EVANS, it was Ordered, That its further consideration be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

STEAM FRIGATE BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, its Chief Clerk, announcing that they had passed a bill to authorize the construction of six steam frigates, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN. That is identical with the bill which has passed the Senate. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to its immediate consideration and passage.

The bill was read a second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF HOUSE BILLS.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill regulating the pay of deputy postmasters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, that the House had passed a bill to repeal part of an act entitled "An act to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NEW MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received numerous communications from the Legislative Council of New Mexico. If it be the pleasure of the House, I will present them to the body.

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. These memorials and resolutions relate to various subjects, some to the construction of roads; some to the preservation of the public documents of the Territory; some to the erection of public buildings. If it be the pleasure of the House, they will be referred to the several appropriate committees.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the petitions be referred to the various appropriate committees, and that they be printed.

It was so ordered.

THE COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills is not present at this time, and that there is, therefore, a pressing necessity for the appointment of one additional member to that committee. The Chair would, at the same time, suggest that it might be as well to appoint two additional members, in order to meet the contingencies of the session. Is it the pleasure of the House that two additional members be added to the Committee on Enrolled Bills?

The MEMBERS generally assented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will understand the House as having unanimously ordered the appointment of two additional members to that committee.

CLAIMS OF MARYLAND.

Mr. MAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to present a memorial from the State of Maryland, that it may be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and printed. It is the memorial of the special agents of the State of Maryland asking for the reimbursement of the State for her "advances" to the United States in 1792 and 1793.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed.

ESTIMATES FROM DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I have received from the Department of the Interior a large amount of estimates; and I ask that they may be laid upon the table, and printed.

It was so ordered.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I would not encroach upon the time of the House at this time, but from necessity. I desire to make a motion, before we resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of accomplishing an object which, I believe, the House of Representatives almost effirely favor.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, we have a special order of the House to consider the bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands. It seems to be the wish of a large majority of the House—at all events of those with whom I have consulted on the subject—that this special order be postponed until this day two weeks, so as to give every gentleman in the House an opportunity of investigating the matter fully, fairly, and properly; and further, to enable them to get clear of the other business before them. The deficiency bill must come up, and ought to be disposed of first. If, therefore, it be the unanimous consent of the House that this special order should be postponed for two weeks, I have no objection at all to that arrangement. If it be the pleasure of the House, I will now make a motion to that effect, before we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; because, unless the motion is made now, we will not be able to accomplish the desired object after the House has gone into committee.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Oh, no; let it not be postponed. These special orders are always in the way; and we may as well go to this one at one time as at another.

Mr. COBB. I have indicated my desire to have it postponed; but as I find I cannot have the unanimous consent of the House, I give notice to the House, that immediately after we resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I will proceed to discuss this graduation bill. It is the first business to come up; and I trust that every gentleman will send into the document room and procure a copy of the bill, so that he may fully understand what we have before us. I made the motion to postpone; but as objection has been made, I am ready to take up the matter.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I conceive that it is in order for the House to postpone this special order. According to the practice of the present Speaker, during the last session of Congress, we have more than once, during the last Congress, postponed a special order from one day to the other. I hold, therefore, that my colleague [Mr. Cobb] has the right to make the motion to postpone. We have already, in fact, postponed this very special order this session.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, as the bill is not before the House at all.

Mr. COBB. No; it could not be before the House, as it has been made a special order, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, we have already postponed this very special order at this session.

The SPEAKER. That was, however, by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know whether it was by unanimous consent or not; but, at all events, it was postponed, and it has been frequently ruled by the Chair that it is in the power of the House, if the majority vote in favor of it, to postpone a special order. The House has the control over the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the bill were before the House the motion would be in order, and it would be a necessary consequence that the majority could direct the postponement. But it is not now before the House; and therefore it is that the Chair thinks the motion to postpone is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the Chair allow me to say this: This bill, it is true, is not before the House; but, by the special order of the House, it is before the Committee of the Whole. The House, however, has control over it still, and can postpone the special order.

The SPEAKER. That was done under a suspension of the rules, for the express purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under a suspension of the rules it is true, but the House can postpone this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that it is not competent for the House to postpone the consideration of a special order, if objection be made.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. As a gentleman has the floor to-day in Committee of the Whole, and as he is anxious to speak for the reason that he desires to leave the city soon, I will waive my objection, and consent that the bill be postponed for one day.

Mr. COBB. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to take up the bill to-day; but I made the motion for the accommodation of the House, in order that members may have an opportunity to examine it before acting upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then make the motion now.

Mr. COBB. I move that it be postponed for this day two weeks.

Mr. DAWSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he should make the day of postponement four weeks instead of two.

Mr. COBB. Then there will be an objection.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I will consent to a postponement for a week.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to postpone its consideration indefinitely. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but I must respectfully decline his suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a postponement for two weeks?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I consented to one week's delay.

Mr. COBB. Then I make my motion to postpone for one week.

Mr. DAWSON. I object to one week.

REPORTS FROM LAND COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the motion is not in order. The first business in order is reports from committees, commencing with the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WARREN. I hold in my hand several petitions from the Committee on Public Lands, which I am directed to report back to the House adversely, and move that they be laid upon the table.

The petitions were accepted, and ordered to lie upon the table. They were as follows:

The petition of the soldiers of the war of 1812, of Fairfax county, Connecticut, for one hundred and sixty acres of bounty land;

The petition of Alfred W. and Solomon Gillett, for bounty lands;

The petition of the residents and citizens of Kings county, the grand jury, the officers of the 5th brigade of the New York militia, the Mayor and Common Council of Brooklyn, and of one thousand four hundred and sixteen citizens of the city and county of New York, ask for the extension of the bounty land act, passed September 28, 1850; and

The resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to grant one hundred and sixty acres of land to the soldiers of the war of 1812.

Mr. DAWSON. I withdraw, Mr. Chairman, the objection which I made to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb], to postpone the consideration of the special order for one week.

No objection being made to the motion, the consideration of the bill was, by unanimous consent, postponed for one week.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a report this morning from the Committee on the Judiciary, not with a view of having it acted upon, but for the purpose of having it referred.

Mr. ORR. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WRIGHT. I make the request now, because I am obliged to leave the city soon.

Mr. ORR. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. EDGERTON. I renew the objection.

Objection being made, the report was not admitted.

Mr. LATHAM, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, as follows, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

A bill to establish the office of surveyor general of New Mexico, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes;

A bill to amend an act approved September 27, 1852, to create an office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, &c., and also the act amendatory thereof, approved February 19, 1853; and

A bill to establish an office of surveyor general of Utah, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. HIESTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported adversely upon the following petitions; which were laid upon the table, and the committee discharged from their further consideration:

Of the heirs of Colonel Samuel French, of the State of Massachusetts, asking for commutation and bounty land;

Of Martha Gray, widow of Captain Robert Gray, the discoverer of the Columbia river, asking for relief; and

Of Elizabeth Hall, widow of Sergeant John Hall, late a soldier of the revolutionary army, praying for a grant of land in lieu of military land warrants, &c.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported adversely upon the following petitions; which were laid upon the table, and the committee discharged from their further consideration:

Of George Heavenridge and one hundred and eighty-one others, citizens of Union county, Indiana, in favor of granting lands to actual settlers, and against their sale to speculators; and of citizens of Alabama, for the removal of the land office from Sparta, in said State.

Mr. C. remarked, in reference to the former petition, that a general law had been passed covering the case.

Mr. COBB. I now desire to report, from the Committee on Public Lands, a bill founded upon a petition referred to that committee, which I ask may be read a first and second time; and then I hope the House will indulge me in having it put upon its passage. It is a bill to authorize the selection of sixteenth sections within the limits of the twelve miles square reservation in the State of Alabama.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, and then read through.

It provides that the school commissioners in the Huntsville district, Alabama, be authorized to select respectively, by legal subdivisions, from any of the surveyed public lands, the quantity, as near as may be, contained in the sixteenth sections of townships within the twelve miles square reservation; which selections, upon being approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be holden by the same tenure, and for the same terms, for the support of schools in said townships as the sections numbered sixteen, within the said reservation would have been, had not treaty stipulations made other disposition thereof.

Mr. COBB. I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments when I inform them that I have not lost a vote during this Congress; that I have been constant upon my attendance upon the sessions of the House, and upon those of its committees, thereby furthering the business of the House as much as it has been in my power to do. I have not missed one sitting of the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am a member, nor have I missed a sitting of the Pacific Railroad Committee, of which I am also a member. I have not made, nor do I intend to make, any hours speeches.

I do not trouble the House often with any remarks; but when I do, I intend always that such remarks shall be pertinent to the measures under consideration. In view of these facts, I think I have the right to ask the House to hear me patiently for a few minutes this morning in relation to the bill which is now before the House.

Mr. KERR. I rise to a question of order. I wish simply to inquire if debate is strictly in order upon this bill?

The SPEAKER. It is strictly in order.

Mr. COBB. I am most certainly in order; but I will not trouble the House for more than five minutes. When the State of Alabama was admitted into the Union, I find that every section of the public lands numbered sixteen was set apart for educational purposes. I also find that by the stipulations of a treaty with the Chickasaw Indians in 1819, there was a section of country twelve miles square set apart for school purposes. These lands were to be sold, and the proceeds applied for educational purposes among the Indians.

The sixteenth sections of other lands which I am now asking in lieu thereof are found to be in that twelve miles square. Some years ago, when that portion of land was sold by the General Government for the benefit of the Indians, the Government, from some cause or other, believed that the citizens of the respective townships were entitled to the sixteenth sections. It did not sell them. Those citizens have been enjoying their benefits for that number of years. Two years ago the question arose in relation to the right of the citizens to those sixteenth sections. It was brought before the Department, which decided that, inasmuch as by treaty stipulations it was agreed the twelve miles square should be disposed of for the benefit of the Indian tribes, the sixteenth sections therein could not be exempted. Then you perceive the difficulty that now exists. The citizens, after having been in possession of those sections for twenty-five years, are now decided not to be entitled to them.

We find that a law, enacted in 1826, authorizes the citizens of townships, where there are no sixteenth sections by grants of land or otherwise, to select other lands in lieu thereof. You have, then, the whole matter summed up. What do I ask? Only that the citizens of the townships to which I have referred, shall, by their proper authorities, be authorized to locate other lands in lieu of those of which they have been deprived by regular subdivision. They ought to have that privilege. If they are required to locate their land in conformity with the act which I hold in my hand, they will be forced to locate each sixteenth section in a solid body. If they are so required, as I stated on a former occasion, they lose the benefit of the grant to a great extent, and get but little land. The bill merely authorizes them to locate the sixteenth sections by regular subdivision, and as small a quantity as forty acres. You know that their interest will induce them to locate in larger tracts, if possible.

I will make no further remarks. The justness of the provisions of the bill is evident; but, as an equivalent, if the House grant me the favor I ask, I promise that the Committee on Public Lands will instantly pass off, and report no other railroad bills until called again. I trust the House will pass the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a bill to amend an act entitled "an act to authorize the correction of erroneous locations of military land warrants by actual settlers on the public land, in certain cases," with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HIESTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report adversely on the petition of George Nix, who was a soldier in the revolutionary war, and as a member of the Virginia Line, entitled to — acres of land in the now fertile State of Kentucky. In ignorance of his rights, he neglected to apply for it, and is now informed that it is too late to do it. The committee conceive that there are many others in the same situation with the petitioner; and regard the subject as one of general rather than special legislation. They therefore, as I have said, direct me to report adversely on it, and to move that it be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill to equalize the grants of lands to the several States for certain public purposes.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. I understand that this is not a report from the committee at all.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes it is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and reports this bill from that committee.

Mr. BENNETT. I will state to the Chair how the fact is. The committee directed the bill to be reported back, but a majority of the committee recommend that it do not pass; a minority recommend its passage, and I desire to take the sense of the House as to which of those recommendations shall be supported by the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what is the report of the Committee on Public Lands, whether it is that the bill lie upon the table or that it be passed?

Mr. BENNETT. I will state to the gentleman that there are two reports.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, what is the report of the committee, that is of the majority, of course?

Mr. BENNETT. The recommendation of the majority is, that the bill do not pass, but the minority recommend its passage.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I ask the gentleman what motion he makes with reference to the bill, in accordance with the direction of the committee?

Mr. BENNETT. I make this motion with regard to the bill. I move to put it upon its passage, but I do not mean to spend any time on it. If the House will permit me, I will state precisely what the bill is, and what I propose to do with it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to make an inquiry of the gentleman. I wish to know if this bill was referred by the House to the Committee on Public Lands or not?

Mr. BENNETT. It was.

Mr. JONES. Or was it originated by the committee?

Mr. BENNETT. It was referred to the committee, but the bill which I have reported is not precisely the bill which was referred to the committee. It has been changed in some respects.

Mr. JONES. Then, the gentleman reports back the bill which was referred?

Mr. BENNETT. No; I report it back with an alteration.

Mr. JONES. Then it is a substitute, and the gentleman should report back the original bill with a recommendation that it be substituted. I will make a question of order on the gentleman. It seems, from what the gentleman says, that this is not the bill which was referred to the committee, and I submit this point to the Chair, that the committee has no right to report back a bill with a substitute or with an amendment, and recommend the rejection of that bill.

Mr. BENNETT. This precise question was raised during the last Congress when I presented a similar bill.

Mr. JONES. No, sir; let me correct the gentleman. Last year when the bill was reported, the question was made that it had never been referred by the House to the committee. In this case, however, a bill was referred by the House to the committee, and, as I understand the gentleman from New York, he reports back a different bill and recommends its rejection.

Mr. COBB. No; the gentleman is mistaken as to the fact. The bill was referred to the committee and is reported back.

Mr. JONES. Will the Clerk read the bill which has been reported?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York be kind enough to state what the committee reports?

Mr. BENNETT. I will state the facts to the Chair. The bill as prepared by me, and referred to the committee, contained a provision looking to all the States, and regarding the public lands as, to some extent, the property of all. The committee believe that the bill was put in a shape which would be the least objectionable. It is not an amendment or a substitute, but it is a mere change of the bill itself in one respect.

Mr. JONES. I wish to inquire if the original bill is reported back, with a recommendation that it be amended in a particular way?

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to state further, that if this bill is ruled out of order, I shall ask to present the original bill. I will detain the House but a short time.

Mr. JONES. I understand that it is not the original bill; and I contend that they cannot retain the original bill which was referred to the committee, and make a report of a different bill; because it becomes an act of introduction, and cannot be done without the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is very true. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] may report an amendment by order of the committee, or a substitute for the original bill; but he cannot retain the original bill, and base another, and a very different bill, upon it.

Mr. BENNETT. It is the same bill as the original, with a slight exception.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hand of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, informing the House that that body had passed a bill of this House entitled "An act to authorize the construction of six first class steam-frigates;" and also a bill of this House entitled "An act for the relief of James M. Goggin;" and asking the concurrence of the House therein.]

Mr. JONES. I wish to have the question decided. I understand that this is not the bill which was referred to the committee by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York can state how the fact is in regard to this matter. The Chair decides that the Committee on Public Lands have the right to originate bills, but he also decides that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] cannot report a bill from the Committee on Public Lands, based upon or in lieu of the one referred to that committee, and still retain the original one.

Mr. ORR. I understand that the Committee on Public Lands have not recommended this amendment at all.

Mr. BENNETT. They have recommended it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg leave to correct the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] A majority of the committee recommended the alteration, and they have not gone beyond the principles of either bill in the aggregate.

Mr. JONES. I submit this further question. That the committee cannot report the original bill with an amendment, as a substitute, and recommend the rejection of the bill itself, which was referred to them.

Mr. GREY. I merely desire to say one word. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] as I understand him, says that this bill was presented to the House, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That committee agreed to some slight alteration, or recommended some slight alteration, in that bill. They now report it back to the House with that alteration in it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] can report that bill back now.

Mr. BENNETT. If the Chair pleases, I propose to report the original bill back; and I ask the Chair whether it would be in order to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York can offer any amendment, if he desires it.

Mr. JONES. Has the gentleman from New York authority to report the original bill back without amendments?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, sir, or the other. A majority of the committee prefer the other bill, and it was agreed that we should report the other bill, without the original. I am willing to report the original bill.

Mr. JONES. I wish to make this inquiry of the gentleman from New York, for I want to have the question right before the House. Does the gentleman report that bill back from the Committee on Public Lands without amendment?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes.

Mr. JONES. And recommend its rejection?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes; we recommend its rejection; but I propose to offer an amendment or substitute for it.

Mr. JONES. Well, but the recommendation of the committee is that the bill be rejected.

The SPEAKER. Still it is competent for the House to follow a different direction.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to inquire of the Chair how much of the morning hour remains unexpired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire at fifteen minutes after one o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to give the House an opportunity to see in print this bill which the committee recommends to be rejected, and the one which I shall offer as an amendment or substitute for it; and for that reason I wish to detain the House until the morning hour expires in making an explanation of what the bill is. I wish to make a motion, so as not to have the bill laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York as submitting a proposition to amend the bill. The Chair did not distinctly hear the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. BENNETT. I meant to say that I wished to make a few remarks as to this bill, and then let it go over till to-morrow morning, so that it may appear in print; and I shall offer at the proper time—and do offer now—a substitute or amendment to the bill; and I hope that both will be printed, so that both may be legitimately before the House.

And now, Mr. Speaker, before going into any report on this bill, I wish to make a motion to refer—

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from New York allow the Chair to set himself right, so that there may be no mistake about the matter. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York as offering the first paper, which he sent to the Clerk's table, as an amendment or substitute to the original bill which he reports back from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, sir; the Chair understands aright.

I wish, also, Mr. Speaker, to make a motion to refer this bill back, after it is amended, to the Committee on Public Lands; which I do for the purpose of saving it from being laid on the table. I therefore, before I commence my explanatory remarks, move to recommit the bill back to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer will be entered.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the morning hour, so that the bill and substitute proposed may be printed and placed in the hands of members to-morrow morning; and will therefore state to this House what the bill is. It asserts a principle that I supported in the last Congress, and for which I am an earnest advocate now, that the public lands belong to all the States of the Union; that they were granted or purchased for the benefit of all, and should be used for their common benefit. I am not among the number who deny the power of Congress to grant lands to the States for railroads, or any other public purpose, or who believe that it is not expedient to make such grants, if equally and fairly made, in a proper manner, and to a proper extent. Yet, while I admit this, I claim that there should be some fairness and equality in the way these lands are distributed for public purposes to the several States; that if we give land to the State of Illinois for railroads, there would be no justice in our withholding it from the State of Iowa. If we give land to build railroads to the State of Missouri, we cannot in justice refuse to give it to the State of Wisconsin to a like amount, and for the same purpose.

There should be some equality and justice observed even among the land States themselves in the amount of these grants. There are some two or three of these land States to which grants of public lands have been made to the amount of two, three, or four millions of acres each, to aid in constructing railroads. The others, on the contrary, have not received any such grants. I am willing to give to all of the land States grants to an equal amount, on fair and just principles, for this purpose, if justice is also done to the old States; but if we give to them all at that rate, we should exhaust a great portion of the public lands; and that which belongs equally to all would be given unequally to a few, unless some equal and just plan is adopted, or some general bill is passed.

There should be some principle of justice and equality in these grants or gifts of the public lands to the States; the old States should have their share in some form, or at least some share, before we go on with this system. That form, of course, should be the one least objectionable, by which they should receive a like benefit, by grants to them from the public lands for similar purposes—if not to an equal amount—as are bestowed upon the other States.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill looking to this object. It was passed by the House, but was not acted upon in the Senate. It provided for giving to the old States public lands, at the rate of one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in Congress from those States. It also provided for giving to those States which had not received grants of land for railroads, lands to an amount as nearly equal as possible to that which had been granted to the State of Illinois—the State which has received the largest amount for that purpose, of any State in the Union.

This bill, or the substitute which I now propose, contains the same principle, but is not the same in its detail, or in the manner of accomplishing the object in view. Those western States which have not received grants for roads, say that they have already, by law, received the grants for schools. Every sixteenth (in some of the States every sixteenth and thirty-sixth) section is given to them for that purpose. They now desire grants for railroads, confined to that object alone, and specifying the routes of the intended roads. They tell us that if Congress makes grants to them of so many acres to each State, their Legislatures will distribute it out to every county, and the lands will be of no real or practical benefit. In this they are universally agreed. They want to avoid that result. In the last Congress they made strong objection to a general bill, for this reason: Because they said the lands would be of no benefit to them, but would be wasted on a thousand different projects. To avoid that difficulty, they suggested to me to bring in a bill for the old States alone; that is, the States which had no public lands within their limits, in some form, as an equivalent for these grants for railroads to the other States, and to let each of the land States take their grants for roads in a separate bill, specifying the routes of the roads, and limiting the amounts to the same proposed in the general bill. I have assented to this; and now propose such a bill, to see if Representatives from land States are willing to give the old States any land at all, in any form, or to any amount, for the same purposes as those for which it has been so liberally granted to them.

This bill, therefore, only provides for the grant of lands to seventeen States, which have no public lands, and have received no grants, at the rate of one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in Congress. It will require between twenty and thirty millions of acres to provide for all the old States equally at this rate, a small equivalent for the grants made to, and now asked for, by the land States. It is objected, that if grants are made to the old States, they will go into the land States and take up large tracts of land and hold them for a long time, or at a high price, to the injury of the new States. This bill obviates that objection. It provides for the distribution of no lands directly to the old States, but that the States shall be entitled to receive and to dispose of land warrants (not less than eighty nor more than one hundred and sixty acres each) to the amount in all granted to each State. These warrants will be sold to actual settlers going into the new States, and that the old States shall have the benefit of the sale of these warrants; but no State is to locate any warrants in its own name, or for its own benefit. Instead of the General Government, as now, selling the lands to this amount, and receiving the avails into the public Treasury, (after deducting the expense of sales, &c.,) each of the old States is to be allowed to sell an amount of land warrants equal to the amount granted to that State, and retain the proceeds for the benefit of the State for school purposes, or purposes similar to those for which the lands are granted to the land States.

The land warrant system is in practical operation now; and as it exists, is adopted by this bill. It takes up the system as we find it, and through that system avails itself of the opportunity of making an equivalent to the old States, without prejudice to the land States, in any way, for the large grants made to them. We desire a settlement among the States of the land account before this system goes further. Many gentlemen do not understand the large amount of grants that have been made to a few States. I have said that I admitted the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands. If Congress has not that power, there is no Department of the Government which has. The exclusive and entire right to dispose of these lands is conferred, by the Constitution, as clearly as any other power which Congress may exercise. This power has been exercised by Congress. Ever since the days of Jefferson down to the present time, the public lands have been granted for almost every conceivable purpose; but they have been granted for the benefit of the land States alone, and not for the benefit of all the States. I have a report before me giving the amount granted to a part of the States, as follows:

Congress has not only made these grants often, but to large amounts. The amount of land granted away by Congress exceeds the amount that has been sold.

An official statement from the Commissioner of Public Lands shows that there has been granted to the States and Territories named, up to June 30, 1853, for railroads, internal improvements, schools, and deaf and dumb asylums, as follows:

To Ohio.....	1,970,530 acres.

Amount of grants over the sales.....19,865,095 "

Add grants for military services.....24,841,930 "

Amount.....44,707,075 "

Amount of grants and sales.....252,001,787 "

These grants (except for military services) are for the benefit of only a part of the States, and the old States have been wholly excluded.

The swamp lands granted to California are many millions of acres, but have not been returned, and are not included above.

Had the land granted to the land States and the Territories—123,062,451 acres—been sold at Government price, it would have amounted to $153,448,954. The share of New York in this, according to representation, would have been $21,693,824.

Sir, there has been appropriated to the land States and Territories, for all purposes, about twenty million acres more land than have been sold up to June 30, 1853, exclusive of grants for military service of some twenty-four million acres. Is it reasonable, or is it just or proper, if this system is to be pursued, that the lands should go exclusively for the benefit of the land States? Is it right, when we have granted nearly fifty million acres of land for school purposes to the land States and Territories, that we should not grant any lands for school purposes to the old States? If all the lands granted away had been sold, and the proceeds divided among all the States, the share belonging to New York, according to representation, would have amounted to more than $20,000,000—enough to pay our whole State debt for internal improvements.

But, sir, that is passed; these grants have been made; and the question now is, shall we allow the land States to appropriate all the lands which yet remain—lands which were purchased by the common property of the country? I take occasion here to say that I care not what reports may have been presented upon the subject, I do not believe it can be demonstrated that the public lands have been a source of revenue to the Government. We have paid millions and hundreds of millions of dollars for these lands more than has been received from the sales, if all that is justly chargeable to the lands is placed in the account, and charged against them.

By the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I see that we have paid the Indians $35,000,000 for land purchased of them. As long ago as 1839, in reply to a resolution of some Senator, I think Mr. Corwin, there was an official report made to the Senate, by which it appeared that over $85,000,000 had been paid to the Indians for lands, up to that time. Purchases and payments have been made ever since; and now it is stated at $35,000,000. How does this happen? By what process was it reduced, instead of increasing? We have been making new purchases ever since 1839, and paying annuities, some of which cease only with the existence of the Indian tribes to whom they are paid. We have also given money, goods, and other lands, in exchange. We have since been repeatedly making appropriations for gifts, and presents, and expenses of commissioners to make new treaties with the Indians, and purchase lands of them. There is scarcely an Indian appropriation bill passes that does not contain forty, fifty, or a hundred thousand dollars for these or similar purposes.

But, sir, I will not now pursue this train of argument further; I have not the proper documents before me. I repeat, that if all that is justly chargeable to the public lands were placed in the account, I do not believe they have ever been a source of revenue to the Government; I do not believe they ever will be. I am in favor of grants of the public land for railroad purposes, if made equally for the benefit of all the States. I am not opposing the policy; but, in making the grants, I want the old States treated fairly. The public lands are the common property of all the States; the old States should not be excluded. But we are asked to vote for those railroad grants, when it is proclaimed that they are to be made for the benefit of the land States alone.

It is contended that the old States have no right to complain, because, as it is said, they lose nothing by these railroad grants. And it is urged that the price of the alternate sections of land is doubled, and that all the land granted is thus paid for. This argument has been pressed beyond all kind of reason. It was a very ingenious mode of getting the land; but it has never been true to anything like the extent claimed. To show this, I have only to refer to the Illinois Central railroad.

Take, for example, the Illinois Central railroad, as most favorable for those relying upon this argument. The grants for that road were as follows:

To Illinois.....2,595,053 acres.

To Mississippi.....737,130 acres.

To Alabama.....419,528 "

Amount granted to that road.....3,751,711 "

Reserved to be offered at double price:

In Illinois.....1,223,921 acres.

In Mississippi.....288,495 "

In Alabama.....167,045 "

Amount to be offered at double price...1,651,874 "

The land granted to the road, 3,751,711 acres, amounts at Government price, to $4,689,639.

If all the reserved sections could be sold at double price, it still leaves a clear gift to this road of $2,624,697. But the act only reserved these sections, and required them to be offered at the increased price before they were sold at the ordinary rate.

They were brought into market in July, 1852, and up to September, 30, 1853, (one year and three months,) there had been sold in Illinois, at the double price, only 284,080 acres, and the amount over the ordinary price received was $355,100, (and from this all additional expenses should be deducted,) to repay Government for the grant or gift of land, to the amount of $4,689,639—not one thirtieth part as much. It is doubtful whether any railroad grant, made or to be made, under this admirable "lose-nothing" system, (for it has come to be a system,) will repay to Government, including all additional expenses, one dollar in ten of the value of the land given to the road.

That road had nearly four million acres of the public land granted to it. It passed through the States of Illinois, Mississippi, and Alabama. Its selections of land were made within a range of fifteen miles on each side of the road, and the doubled sections only extended six miles on each side, and that has been the precedent and pattern for all the grants made since. The alternate sections, to the amount of one million six hundred thousand and odd acres were doubled in price. If every acre of that land were sold at double price, there would be still a clear gift of over $2,500,000 to the road.

But it was further alleged that the alternate sections would be sold as soon as they were brought into market, at the double price. The alternate sections of the public land along the central Illinois railroad, were brought into market in July, 1852, and up to the 30th June, 1853, when they had been in market one year, only about two hundred and eighty thousand acres were sold within the limits of Illinois. The land in the other States was but trifling in amount. The argument that the Government would not be a loser by the grants is not true fact, and never has been. If all the extra expense of a public sale and of putting the land into market at the double price, were taken into account, I do not believe that the proceeds of the alternate sections would pay one tenth part of the value of the land granted to the road. The idea of doubling the price of the public land does not amount to much in fact, so far as the States can show. And the theory of doubling the price of the public land is wrong, in my judgment; I do not think that we ought to double the price of the public land, but to make the grants independent of that consideration. Let those who emigrate to the West have the best of the land to settle on, if they make the first settlements and locations.

We should not forget, too, that in doubling the price of the public land, we only tax the actual settlers to build the roads for the benefit of companies and corporations. The land given to the railroad is, by this system, also increased in price. The company will hold it for a time, and then put it into the market at an exceedingly advanced price. I could not vote for grants of the public land for railroad purposes upon the theory that they pay for themselves. I do not believe it. I deny it altogether.

It is also said that the grants increase sales, and thereby benefit the United States, just as if that were a matter of great importance, whether the sales were made more or less rapidly. We are now selling our public land as fast as emigration demands; and it is certainly wrong to stimulate settlement to an undue and unnatural extent.

But look at the table of sales, and while the system of railroad grants has been in full operation, and you will find that the sales have not increased.* In 1852 the sales were not as great as they had been for either of the twelve years

*There was more land sold in 1836 than has been sold for the last twelve years up to January, 1853, (the returns for 1853 are not yet all made.) Yet this railroad system (that is said so rapidly to increase the sales) had been in full operation for two or three of the last years. The lowest sales in any one year were in 1852, (less than one preceding. More land was sold in 1836 than during the entire twelve past years. The spirit of speculation was rife. There was a great deal of land sold in 1836—over twenty millions acres. Perhaps it was an unhealthy state of public sentiment on the subject of the public lands; but it shows that capitalists will buy and sell land as it suits their interest without reference to railroad grants; other considerations control.

The old States have not received an acre of the public lands granted to the States; and, so far as grants for railroad purposes are concerned, they do not make any, or a very small compensation for the grants under the system pursued. It will take only between twenty and thirty millions of acres to make up to the old States the equivalent given by this bill. And any gentleman can calculate how much his own State will get under it, as it grants one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative. Is that a great boon to ask from our western friends in return for the vast grants which they have received already, and which they are now asking for?

Let me state one other fact to the House. There are proposed to be granted to the land States during this very session, for railroad purposes, over fifteen million acres of public lands, so as to give an amount to the other land States equal to that which has been given to the State of Illinois. That is more than one half the amount which this bill proposes to give to all the old States; and yet we are asked to grant that amount to the land States for railroad purposes alone, during one single session—and to pursue this system year after year—without any provision being made for the old States.

Before any more of these railroad measures are taken up, I desired to bring this bill before the House, and to take the sense of the House upon it; to know how generously, or rather how justly, we are to be treated by those who are continually asking us to grant away the public domain to their States, at the rate of fifteen or twenty millions of acres at a session. This bill contains nothing more nor less than a recognition of the right of all the States to the public domain, and to be taken for the same public purposes, and particularly for schools.

Gentlemen from the land States tell us that the old States are indirectly benefited by the grants for railroad purposes. They say you settle and build up the western States, and by so doing, you indirectly benefit the whole country. I grant the argument, but I say that these grants to the old States will also indirectly benefit the West. The argument is just as good one way as the other. We want a small share of the direct benefits of these grants, and let them have their just proportion of the indirect benefits received by all.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman, I will move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman is a little hoarse to-day, and can finish his remarks to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT. I give way for that purpose. The question was taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's motion, and it was agreed to.

[The following is a copy of the bill referred to the Committee on Public Lands, January 3, 1854, and reported back to the House yesterday by Mr. BENNETT, with a substitute therefor:

A BILL granting lands equally to the several States, to aid in the construction of railroads and for the support of schools.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, million of acres,) being the very year the reserved sections on the Central railroad were brought into market!

That there is hereby severally granted to each of the States, of Alabama, California, Florida, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Wisconsin, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, public lands at the rate of one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative to which said States are respectively entitled; and a further grant of one million of acres is hereby severally made to each of the States, of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, and Mississippi, and of one million five hundred thousand acres to each of the States, of California, Iowa, and Wisconsin; said lands, so far as may be, to be taken within the limits of said States respectively, in the manner, and for the purposes hereinafter mentioned; and to each of the States of Ohio and Indiana, all the public lands remaining unsold within the respective States of Ohio and Indiana, and not reserved for any public purpose.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the eight States in the preceding section first named are authorized to apply the proceeds of the lands hereby severally granted to them to aid in the construction of railroads in the said States respectively. And a right of way through the public lands is hereby severally granted to the said States, and they are severally authorized to take necessary materials of earth, stone, and timber, for the construction of the said railroads respectively, from the public lands adjacent thereto, and in locating each of these said railroads, and assigning the limits thereto, no more land shall be taken from the United States than is necessary for the convenient construction and use of each of said railroads, with double track respectively, including stations and the public buildings of all kinds connected with said roads, turnouts, and such other appurtenances as are necessary or usually enjoyed by first-class railroads; and a copy of the location of said several roads respectively, as now made, or hereafter to be made, shall be forwarded to the proper local land offices, and the General Land Office at Washington city, as soon as practicable after the same are completed respectively, and shall be duly recorded; and there is hereby severally granted to each of the eight States in the preceding section first named, respectively, the amount of land therein specified, for the purpose of making railroads therein respectively, as aforesaid, to be taken within said States respectively, and along the entire length of the line or route of said several railroads, so far as the United States own lands on the line of said several roads, in manner following, viz: every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers, for six miles in width on each side of said several railroads; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of any of said roads are definitely fixed, sold any section, or any part thereof, granted aforesaid, or that the right of preemption has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the Governor of each of said States respectively, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States nearest to the tiers or sections above specified, and within said States respectively, so much land in alternate sections or parts of sections as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, or to which the right of preemption has attached as aforesaid, which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold or to which preemption rights have attached as aforesaid, together with the sections or parts of sections designated by odd numbers as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid) shall be held by each of the said eight States first named respectively, to the amount in the preceding section named for each of the said several States, for the uses and purposes aforesaid; but the lands to be so located and selected for, and on account of each of said roads shall in no case be more than six sections of land for each mile of said road: Provided, That the lands hereby granted to the said eight first named States shall be exclusively applied to construct or aid in the construction of railroads in said States respectively, and shall be sold and disposed of only as the work progresses, and in proportion to the length of railroad completed upon each of said roads, and the same shall be applied to no other road or purpose: And provided, also, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatever, shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operation of this section, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said railroads through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way only shall be and is hereby granted.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the other nineteen States in the first section of this act named are severally authorized to apply the proceeds of the lands hereby severally granted to each of said States to aid in the construction of railroads, or canals, or for the support of schools. And the Commissioner of Public Lands, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall issue to each of said nineteen States, respectively, land warrants to the amount in all to which each of said nineteen States are respectively entitled under this act, (except so far as the lands granted to Ohio and Indiana are situated within the limits of said States;) and said nineteen States are severally authorized to sell and dispose of said land warrants; and the same are to be valid and effectual in the hands of any owner or holder thereof, and may be located by such owner or holder upon any public lands for sale or subject to private entry, and the same fees to be paid therefor by the holders thereof. And the title of the land so located by any owner or holder of said land warrants, shall be secured and perfected to such owner or holder, in the same manner as other land warrants issued by the United States. Said land warrants shall be so engraved and printed as to prevent deception and counterfeiting; shall be signed by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the Public Lands, or for them by such other persons as the Secretary may direct, and countersigned by the Governor of each State receiving the same, or by such other officers as the said nineteen States may respectively designate for that purpose; and said land warrants shall be for not less than eighty, nor over one hundred and sixty acres each: Provided, that no

State shall be authorized to locate any warrants in its own name or for its own benefit; and that no warrant issued under the provisions of this act, shall be located upon any lands to which there shall be a preemption right, or on which there shall be an actual settlement and cultivation, except by the person holding such preemption right, or by such settler and cultivator.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That each and all of the railroads in any State in the Union, made either wholly or in part from the proceeds of the lands granted by this act, are hereby made and declared post roads, and shall forever hereafter, at all times, transport the mails, military stores, forces and property of the United States, under the direction of the proper officers thereof, and Congress may by law fix the rate of compensation to be allowed for such services. And until fixed by law for such compensation as the Postmaster General shall direct.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all mineral lands are hereby reserved to the United States from the operation of this act, except such as are, or hereafter may be, by law subject to private entry by individuals.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all the land granted during the present Congress by any other act to any State named herein, shall be deducted from the amount granted by this act to such State.

The following is the substitute for the above bill:

A BILL to equalize the grants of land to the several States, for certain public purposes:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be, and hereby is severally granted to each of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia and Virginia, public lands at the rate of one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative to which said States are respectively entitled.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That land warrants shall be issued to each of said States, to the amount in all to which they are respectively entitled under the preceding section; and said States are severally authorized to sell said land warrants and apply the proceeds thereof to the support of schools; or, a portion thereof may be applied, under the discretion of the Legislatures of said States respectively, to aid in the construction of railroads or canals.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said land warrants shall be for not less than eighty or more than one hundred and sixty acres each—and shall be valid in the hands of the purchasers, and holders thereof, and may be located by any such owner or holder, upon any of the surveyed public lands, which shall be, at the time for sale and subject to private entry. And the title to the land so located under said warrants, shall be perfected to the owners or holders thereof, in the same manner, as under other land warrants issued by the United States, and the same fees to be paid therefor, said land warrants to be properly engraved, and printed, and signed, when issued by or under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and countersigned as they are sold by or under the direction of the Governor of each of said States respectively: Provided, That no State shall locate any of said land warrants in its own name or for its own benefit, and no land warrant shall be located upon any lands to which there shall be a preemption right, or upon which there shall be an actual settlement and cultivation, except by the person holding such preemption right or by such settler and cultivator—and not more than one half of any one section shall be located under said land warrants.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the half sections or parts of sections of land remaining of the sections, upon which said land warrants shall have been, in part, located, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold, for the next three years after, such land warrants have been located, in part, on said sections.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail and the troops and property of the United States shall be, at all times, transported on all railroads made either wholly or in part from the proceeds of the lands granted by this act, under the direction of the proper officers and Departments of Government, for such compensation as Congress may by law allow, and until so fixed by law for such compensation as the Postmaster General shall direct.]

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Orr in the chair.)

THE CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1855.

Mr. CLINGMAN said that, at a former session, when a bill for the organization of the Territory of Nebraska was under consideration, he proposed an amendment relative to the Indian tribes, and the bill now pending in committee contained a provision in the identical language at that time made use of by him; and the very fact that more than two thirds of that Congress thought the territorial organization necessary, was sufficient for him to support the bill now before them. He voted for that bill because there was nothing offensive in it, and because it was not likely they could get anything better.

He should vote for the Senate bill, but was in favor of striking out the Clayton amendment, not because it was wrong, but because it would lead to no practical result, and embarrass its passage. Mr. BADGER's amendment did not change the character of the bill, which, as it now stood, did not prohibit the people from legislating as the Constitution permits them to do. It merely said the people of the Territories may legislate as the Constitution warrants, without the intervention of Congress, or French, Mexican, or Indian law. Therefore it was a better bill than the bills for Utah and New Mexico, passed in 1850, because they left the Mexican laws in force. It was better than the Clayton compromise, because that left the Mexican law in force. The real point was this: Shall the Territory be left open to everybody, or shall the Wilmot proviso stand on it?

In 1850, he said, certain persons professed to be for intervention when they were not for it. The true friends who sustained Cass no doubt were willing to carry it out; but there was opposition in another quarter, who fought under a sort of mask. He then proceeded to show that the northern Whigs, in 1846, commenced with the Wilmot proviso, and followed up the anti-slavery tactics, with a view of beating down Cass and the Democrats everywhere. If their policy had been carried out in practice, this Government would not be in existence at this day. The northern Whigs were then committed to that policy, but appealed to others—southern men—to keep it away. General Taylor having died, Mr. Fillmore succeeded with a more liberal policy, and the questions then pending were settled. He then spoke of the change which has since been effected in the North, more favorable to the South; and made remarks, generally, on the subject of slavery, and against the many mischievous efforts made to abolish it.

He said, in this connection, the southern system is a prosperous one, and there was no reason for arraying Government against it; the condition of the negro, morally, socially, and physically was better than that of the negro race elsewhere on the face of the earth, either in Africa or out of it.

[A full report of this speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, said that his district adjoined the one which was the residence of Mr. David Wilmot, the father of the Wilmot proviso; and as that gentleman had been engaged during the present week in agitating this subject within the limits of his (Mr. WRIGHT's) district, it became him, therefore, to defend himself.

On Tuesday last a large meeting (or it was so represented in the public prints) was held in the city of Carbondale, in Luzerne county, a portion of his district. Mr. Wilmot made a speech at that meeting, and the first intimation he (Mr. WRIGHT) had of it was three petitions, which he yesterday presented in the House, signed by one hundred and four leading, prominent citizens of Carbondale, asking that the Nebraska-Kansas bill might become a law; so that he thought the impression made by Mr. Wilmot in the city of Carbondale did not, perhaps, come up to the expectations of the enemies of that measure.

Mr. W. then expressed his opposition to the CLAYTON amendment in the Senate Nebraska bill, stating that he could not vote for the bill with that clause in it. He had, however, the pledge of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, (Mr. RICHARDSON,) that that clause, so far as he was concerned, should be stricken out. With that clause out of the bill he was ready to sustain it by his vote in the House, and before the country. He was ready to sustain it because it involved a great, an important, and a mighty question—the question of State rights, and of popular sovereignty, and upon this foundation he was ready to stand or fall.

He would say in this place that he would rather be stricken down as an advocate of popular sovereignty, than be returned again to the House having sustained a position in opposition to it. Therefore, so far as regarded his return to this House, it was a matter about which he cared nothing. He cast it from him as a matter of no earthly importance whatever.

Mr. W. then proceeded to prove that there never had been one inch of territory acquired by the Government but what had met with the severest opposition; and that there never had been a Territory organized or a State admitted that had not also met with the bitterest opposition. To-morrow, if Spain were to give us a deed of cession of the island of Cuba, and her Britannic Majesty were also to give us a deed of cession to the Canadas, there would be a party in this House which would vote against accepting the deeds.

He next argued to show that the Missouri compromise had remained a dead letter upon the statute-books for the last thirty years, and proceeded to vindicate the Democratic party from the charge of exciting agitation.

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. MATTESON next obtained the floor.

Mr. YATES. If the gentleman from New York will give way, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MATTESON. I am obliged to go on now.

Mr. MATTESON opposed the measure, and referred to the resolution of the Legislature of New York, and those of various public meetings in that State, against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; and, as a full and ample justification for his course on this occasion, he said that both Whigs and Democrats, without distinction of party, participated in those meetings. He read various extracts in relation to that subject, and opposed the bill until his hour expired.

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

• Pending the delivery of the remarks of Mr. MATTESON, the following interruption took place: Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from New York give way for one moment to allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. MATTESON. With great pleasure.

Mr. ORR. I am glad that the gentleman from New York has afforded me an opportunity to make a corrective with reference to a bill which was introduced and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I see by the papers, that it has been the subject of very great agitation at the North, and I have seen one or two articles, in which the bill was discussed at length. I will state to the gentleman from New York, that the Committee on Indian Affairs have not yet reported that bill back, but have instructed me to do so, striking out altogether that provision which has reference to slaves. The provision allowing to each Indian who owns slaves a reservation in proportion to the number of his slaves, was intended to apply principally, if not exclusively, to the Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Seminoles. The committee have determined to strike out those tribes, inasmuch as it is not proposed to organize any territorial governments over the limits occupied by the tribes I have just enumerated. If there are any slaves in Kansas and Nebraska owned by Indians, I am not aware of it. There are slaves owned by Indian tribes in other territory, to the number of ten or twelve thousand.

Mr. CHANDLER obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to rise? The hour is late.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield the floor for that purpose with great reluctance. [A laugh.]

Mr. WASHBURN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill "making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1855," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRIVATE BILL.

On the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of William Claude Jones.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to settle the account of William Claude Jones against the United States, for his military services in the United States Army, and to allow him the difference between the pay of a private, which he did receive, and the compensation of a commissary of subsistence, to which he is entitled, from the 28th of September, 1837, to the 2d of April, 1838.

On the 28th of September, 1837, Jones was mustered into the service of the United States as a private, at Jefferson barracks, in Missouri; upon the same day he was appointed "Commissary in Morgan's spy battalion of mounted riflemen," by Lieutenant Colonel A. G. Morgan, under authority from the Secretary of War.

An order from Colonel Z. Taylor, written at Fort Gardner, dated January 28, 1838, directing him to proceed to Tampa Bay, names the petitioner "Lieutenant Jones."

The records of the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury show that Jones was mustered as a private on the 28th of September, 1837, and that he was paid as such until April 2, 1838, and that no person has been paid as commissary or quartermaster to the "Morgan Spies."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. PETTIT. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill supplementary to an act "confirming claims to land in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes," have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. It is a small matter, which affects but a few citizens, and I hope it will be passed immediately.

Mr. GEYER. I trust the Senate will agree to put that bill upon its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in case the location and boundaries of a tract of land, the claim to which was confirmed by the act of July 4, 1836, "confirming claims to land in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes," cannot be ascertained, the surveyor general for Illinois and Missouri shall grant to the claimant a certificate to that effect, and the claimant shall be permitted to locate an equal quantity, on any unappropriated public land of the United States, in the State of Missouri, subject to entry at private sale.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of the postmasters of Vincennes, Indiana, Shawneetown, Illinois, St. Louis, Missouri, Keokuk and Dubuke, Iowa, and Louisville, Kentucky, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a report of citizens of Newpoint, Indiana, praying an appropriation of land to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, for the construction of a railroad from Fort Wayne, Indiana, via Rochester, Lacon, New Boston, and Wapello, to Council Bluff City, on the Missouri river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of owners of vessels employed in the coasting trade and whale fisheries, residing at Sag Harbor, New York, praying an appropriation for the erection of a custom-house building at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of Evansville, Indiana, praying that the proposed western armory may be located at that place; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JAMES presented the petition of Messrs. Barnes & Mitchell, S. P. Hoover, and others, citizens of Washington, praying that Pennsylvania avenue, in that city, may be paved with the Russ pavement; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented a memorial of the corporate authorities of the town of Wetumpka, Alabama, praying Congress to prevent the erection of bridges over the navigable waters of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHASE, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of William Emmons, senior, praying an extension of a patent granted to his son Uri Emmons, for a planing machine, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs of the late Uri Emmons; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Michael Nourse, praying compensation for the several periods during which he performed the duties of the office of Register of the Treasury, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. FITZPATRICK, it was Ordered, That William Barclay have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled, "An act to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to keep and receive the public money, under the fifteenth section of the act of 6th August, 1846, for the additional services required under that act," approved March 2, 1853.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GEYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Missouri, by the grant of a portion of the public lands; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill to authorize the recovery of the assets of a bankrupt where the same have been concealed or not specified in the schedule by him; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the consideration of the bill reported yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT], from the Committee on Public Lands, "granting lands equally to the several States to aid in the construction of railroads and for the support of schools."

Mr. EASTMAN, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in relation to the homestead bill, and praying a grant of the public lands to aid in the construction of railroads.

Ordered, That said memorial lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have several communications here from the Treasury Department, submitting additional estimates, which, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I wish to present and have referred to that committee, and printed.

There being no objection, the communications were received, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make some reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as I shall necessarily be absent from the city for some days, and my committee will probably be called during that time.

Mr. BENNETT. I have no objection to the presentation of those reports; but I desire to say that the bill which was introduced by me yesterday has only just come into the House in printed form; and, in order that gentlemen may have an opportunity to examine it, I ask that the further consideration of that bill may be postponed until Tuesday next, remaining in the position in which it now stands. I would like the unanimous consent of the House to postpone it to that time.

Mr. COBB. Say Wednesday; for Tuesday there is a special order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would suggest that it be postponed for three weeks.

Mr. BENNETT. It is not my desire that action should be deferred so long.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the proposition of the gentleman from New York will be agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I have every disposition to accommodate the gentleman from New York; but I do not see, if we are to have speeches upon this question of the public lands, why we cannot have them just as well now as at some future day. I will agree not to vote to lay the bill upon the table, or to prevent full and free discussion, until the matter is disposed of; but I am opposed to the proposed postponement, for I do not know what may come up.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from New York has the right to make the motion to postpone, but it is within the discretion of a majority of the House whether they will grant it or not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the gentleman from New York the right to postpone, and to keep this bill before the House as a report from a committee to occupy the subsequent morning hour?

The SPEAKER. He has a right to move to postpone the consideration of the bill, if a majority of the House see fit to grant it; and it will come up in the morning hour.

Mr. JONES. Suppose another committee should be called upon to report in the mean time, and be undisposed of before the time arrives for the consideration of this.

The SPEAKER. This report would take precedence.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. Do I understand the Speaker to decide, if the consideration of this bill is postponed now, that it will be made the special order on the day to which it is postponed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair says, and so does the rule, that when a question is under debate, that no motion shall be received but a motion to adjourn, to lay upon the table, to call for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, &c. The motion is now submitted, that the consideration of this bill be postponed until Tuesday next. The decision of the Chair is, that its consideration will take place in the morning hour as a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the motion by saying this day two weeks.

Mr. DEAN. Is it in order to move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to recommit the bill. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] demand the previous question?

Mr. BENNETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to postpone the consideration of the bill until the time indicated?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has not submitted the motion to postpone the consideration of the bill, but he asks the unanimous consent of the House for that purpose. If it is not given, he proposes to go on with his speech.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] states that he is about to leave the city, and asks the indulgence of the House to make some reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BISSELL. If I am understood as the gentleman objecting to the postponement asked for the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. As understood by the Chair, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] made the objection.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask my colleague if he will not withdraw his objection, as I have no doubt the House will grant unanimous consent to the postponement?

Mr. DEAN. I will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. If no further objection be made, the order will be entered for a postponement of the consideration of the bill until Tuesday next.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. If it is in order, I would like to offer an amendment to the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent. If not objected to, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana will be received.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask leave of the House to have the bill and proposed amendments printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is no objection to that course; and the proposed amendment will be printed, together with the original bill, if not objected to.

It was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] desires, if no objection be made, to make the reports to which he referred.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I want to hear what the amendment to the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands is. Let it be read. How can gentlemen know whether to object to it or not until it is read?

Several MEMBERS. It is too late.

Mr. COBB. I have been asking all the time for information in the matter, and have not been able to obtain it. I will, therefore, object, if the amendment is not read now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Alabama is too late in making an objection at this time.

Mr. GREY. Oh, yes; it is entirely too late now to object. Besides, the House understood the matter sufficiently to vote upon it.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the following resolution and bill; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

Resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws; and

An act for the benefit of the citizens and occupants of the town of Council Bluffs, in Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] will now, if there is no objection, make his reports.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether he expects to put any of the bills which he is about to report on their passage. If he only desires to report them for the purpose of referring them, I have no objection to his doing so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is one bill which, on the reading of the report, I should like to have put upon its passage, if the House will permit me. But if there be any objection to my doing so, of course I will not insist.

I now present an adverse report to the Senate bill No. 132, being a bill for the relief of Albert Hart, increasing his pension.

The bill was read by its title, and laid on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Samuel McKnight, of the State of Kentucky; and

A bill for the relief of William Wallace, of the State of Illinois.

Mr. HENDRICKS also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of George M. Bentley, of the State of Indiana; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the bill, which has just been read by its title, is under my special charge, and as I cannot be in this House when it comes up for consideration, I would be gratified if the House should pass it on the mere reading of the report. I will not press it upon the House, if any gentleman should insist upon going on with the regular order of business. But the report is short, and the matter very plain, so that I hope the House will hear it, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the report.

Mr. LETCHER. It is unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, to read the report now. I hope it will be ordered to be printed, and that the bill in question will take its place among the other bills to be acted on by the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not make objection to the reading of the report. He would understand it in one minute. I would not press the matter, but that I cannot be here when the bill would come up in its regular order.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that; but I do not consider that that is any good reason for the House to go now into the merits of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow the report to be read, I know that he, or any other member, will make no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. ORK. I understood the gentleman to say he was not going to put any bill upon its passage.

Mr. LETCHER. I move the report be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the same committee, also made adverse reports in the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

On the petition of E. P. Hastings, for compensation as pension agent at Detroit from 1836 to 1846;

Petition of James M. French, of the city and State of New York, for an invalid pension on account of disabilities received in the last war with Great Britain;

Petition of Levi Colmus, praying that a pension may be allowed him from 1814 to 1844, when he was placed on the pension roll;

Petition of Hiram Cook and others, heirs of Archibald Cook, asking for a pension;

Petition of John Owens, praying for a pension;

Petition of Oliver Main, of New York, asking for a pension for military services in the war of 1812;

Petition of Constance A. Palmer, for a pension;

Petition of Benjamin F. Wesley, a disabled soldier of the war of 1812, asking for a pension from February 3, 1814, to the 16th November, 1843, when his pension commenced;

Petition of Daniel Ladd, an invalid of the war of 1812, praying for a pension;

Petition of Elijah Frye, of Maine, asking a pension for injuries received in the war of 1812;

Petition of Morris G. Holmes, for the same relief; and Petition of Robert H. Stevens, for a pension for services in the United States Army in 1840.

EXPENSES OF ROGUE RIVER INDIAN WAR.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution of inquiry only.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to this House such estimates for muster rolls and vouchers appertaining to the expenses incurred in the late war with the Rogue River Indians, as may be in his possession, with such recommendation as he may deem right and proper.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not desire to object to the gentleman's resolution, but I desire to say to the Delegate from Oregon, that it will do no good to pass the resolution. Calls were made upon the Secretary of War for information two months ago, and, as yet, no information has been given. He has paid no attention to the calls.

Mr. LANE. I would say to the gentleman that I know the Secretary of War well enough to know that he will act promptly, if the resolution is passed; and I hope it will not be objected to.

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not object to its introduction.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced and passed.

REV. JAMES COOK RICHARDSON.

Mr. SEWARD asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States furnish to this House copies of all the correspondence which has passed between the United States Chargé d'Affaires at Vienna, Austria, and the State Department, in regard to the case of the Rev. James Cook Richardson; also, all the correspondence which has passed between the same in regard to the rejection of the exequatur upon the commission of the United States Consul appointed for Trieste.

Mr. COBB. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill of the following title; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to provide for the appointment of a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and for other purposes.

Also, reported back without amendment, Senate bill (No. 247) "for the relief of Zadoc C. Ingraham," with a recommendation that it do pass; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLDS. The committee have also directed me to report the following joint resolution, to which I ask the attention of the House, as I propose to move to put it upon its passage.

The resolution was read by its title, as follows: Joint resolution explanatory of the second section of the resolution to establish certain post routes, approved July 12, 1852.

The resolution was then read in extenso.

Mr. OLDS. If the House will listen to me for one minute, I think I can satisfy them of the necessity there is for the passage of this resolution. It is a matter of very small importance, so far as the amount is concerned, involving perhaps not more than one hundred dollars. The last Congress passed a resolution providing for paying for the services rendered upon the mail route recited in the resolution; but by the reading of the resolution the Postmaster General construed it as authorizing the payment of the service only up to the time of the passage of the resolution. But the service was rendered during the time of the advertising, which took place in consequence of its becoming a post route, up to the time of the regular letting under the law; and the object of this bill is to provide for the payment for that service. This resolution provides for the payment from the time of the passage of the resolution to which I have alluded up to the time of the regular letting of route. With this explanation I leave the resolution to the House, trusting that it will be passed.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read third a time; and having been engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OLDS. I suppose, in accordance with the usual custom, I must make the motion that the vote by which the resolution passed be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the latter motion agreed to.

Mr. GREY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the benefit of J. C. Buckles, of Louisville, Kentucky; and

A bill for the benefit of McAttee & Eastham.

Mr. McDUGALL, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of James S. Graham and Walker H. Finnall.

TRANSPORTATION OF CALIFORNIA MAIL.

Mr. McDUGALL also reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title:

A bill to empower the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco according to time.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire to ask, if it be the pleasure of the House, to put that bill upon its passage. I ask that it may be read through, after which I propose to make some explanation of its provisions.

The original bill was then read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to negotiate and conclude a contract or agreement for the transportation of the letter and paper mail of the United States from New Orleans, in Louisiana, to San Francisco, in California, and from San Francisco to New Orleans, twice a month, each way, with such person or persons who shall first accept the proposals herein provided, and give satisfactory security for the performance of the service, and shall allow and pay the transportation of said mail in monthly payments, at the rate according to time, as per schedule hereto attached and made a part of this act.

ual or company, whereupon the former company or individual shall not be deemed to have any claim for damage, or otherwise, against the Government.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire in a few brief remarks to explain the provisions of the bill which is now before the House. The public interests seem to require that we should have additional mail facilities between the Atlantic and the Pacific States. We have now already a mail between those States by way of Panama. Under the present contract, the average length of the trips is twenty-five days, at an expense of near $800,000 per year. I have thought that the expense is too great and the time too long. And I might as well answer here as at any other point, the objection that is sometimes urged when we speak of the value of short trips. I am told that two, or three days in a trip make but little difference. When this bill was first sent to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, it was referred by them to the Postmaster General, and I have his letter—and it is but respectful to him that I should allude to it—in which he says that a few days in each trip are of little consequence. The letter is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, March 20, 1854.

Sir: Your note of the 9th instant, inclosing and asking my views upon the bill herewith returned, came duly to hand.

In answer, I have to inform you that I have carefully considered the plan of mail service proposed in this bill, and, in every point of view in which it has presented itself to me, its adoption appears to me to be inexpedient.

The difference of a few days in the performance of a trip is of consequence comparatively only to a limited portion of the whole people; and even looking exclusively to the transportation of the mails, an increased expedition of a few days on a given trip can be of essential importance, at the utmost, to not more probably than one quarter of those engaged in correspondence.

It is proper further to observe, that the present cost of the service from New York and New Orleans to California and Oregon (about $738,000 a year) is considered to be much beyond what the income from the lines will justify, especially in view of the circumstance that in many parts of the United States whole neighborhoods and districts, for miles in extent, are almost wholly without mail accommodations, while other neighborhoods and districts, in every State of the Union, are fully provided with mail facilities, owing to the want of the necessary means to pay for the service. Yet this bill provides that, in the event of the trips being performed within a given time, the annual pay for semi-monthly service, simply between New Orleans and San Francisco, shall be $2,500,000.

I will add, that we have a standing offer to take the mails semi-monthly each way, both from New York and New Orleans to San Francisco, via Nicaragua, at not exceeding $300,000 a year. Therefore we may have a weekly mail on both these lines, say on the 8th, 15th, 22d, and 29th of each month, for $600,000 at most; whereas, under the plan proposed by this bill, a semi-monthly mail only between New Orleans and San Francisco, if run in ten days, leaving each port, say, on the 1st and 15th, and arriving at each on the 10th and 24th of the month, will cost, as above remarked, $2,500,000, or $5,000,000 for weekly service.

Without stating more at length the objections to which, it seems to me, this bill is liable, I certainly can never favor any plan by which, under any circumstances likely to happen, such enormous sums may be drawn from the public Treasury for mail steamship transportation.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL.

Hon. E. B. OLDS, Chairman of Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

And here I wish to call the attention of the House to the value of time. Suppose that in addition to the present route, you pass this bill and establish another line of steamers between the points mentioned, that will make the trip in ten days less time than it is now made, under the present contract and by the present route; and suppose that I save you $2,000,000 a year by this arrangement. How, I am asked, is this to be done? What is the amount of money that we receive annually from California? During the past year we received $86,000,000, and may we not presume that during the next year we shall receive $100,000,000? But to make myself clearly understood, I will put the amount annually received at $50,000,000. Under the present arrangement, that $50,000,000 is detained ten days longer than is necessary on the present mail route. Suppose you can shorten the trip ten days, what will be the gain? The gain will be to the business community—I may say to the tax-paying community, for it falls upon them at last—what the interest is upon the whole amount of the moneys conveyed upon that line. What is the interest on the $50,000,000 per annum, the amount assumed to be received annually from the Pacific, at six per cent. per annum? It is $3,000,000. Upon that basis the interest per day would be within a fraction of $3,220; and for ten days, the shortest time proposed by the schedule, of $32,220. And yet I am told that time is not valuable! Sir, it is everything.

Let us follow this matter a little further. Suppose I save each trip ten days, and that I have two vessels making two trips a month, and each one saving ten days—that is twenty days a month, or two hundred and forty days a year, is it not then clearly demonstrated what it will save to the people of the United States? I do not say to the Government but to the people of the United States, which is the same thing, over $2,000,000 a year, equal to the deficit in the entire mail revenue of the country. But I am told that we should not extend the facilities of the Post Office Department, because the revenue now received is not sufficient to defray the expenses of that Department. That is the main principle I now propose to argue and amend. The revenue is not sufficient, and why? Because it has fallen behind the times—behind the progress of the age—in the mode of transportation. The express lines of the country take away all the regular and important business from the regular lines. Each trip to California, by the way of Panama, averages thirty thousand letters. How much mail matter goes by the express lines and merchant marine? Is it not fair to presume, that an amount equal to one third of that amount goes by private express, at an exorbitant price in the way of postage.

I propose to remedy that evil. We need not be told—the country need not be told—that the cheap postage system affects the revenue of the Post Office Department. It is not so in point of fact. Place that Department upon a proper footing, upon an equality with individual enterprise; reduce your postages still lower, and the amount of revenue would be increased, and amply sufficient to defray the expenses of that Department. But you have allowed it to fall behind the times. It is in a sinking, dilapidated condition—becoming a mere fungus upon the Federal Treasury. You will have to abandon the system entirely, or pay its whole expenses out of the public Treasury. I propose to remedy this evil. I propose to give that Department the advantage of all the improvements and advantages held out by individual enterprise, and to place it in a condition where it can compete with any individual enterprise that may be projected in the way of express lines between the United States and California; not to create a monopoly, but to enable it to compete successfully.

What is the nature of the bill now before the House? Do I propose any expenditure of money? Not at all. I have the proposition here which has been made, establishing the line from New Orleans to San Francisco. I propose, if any individual or company can be found who will undertake to do it according to the schedule, that they shall have the contract; but in the event of a failure, they shall get no pay, under any circumstances. If they are successful, they get the contract to carry the mail until some one else starts a line and conveys it in shorter time for three consecutive months, and gives proof of the same to the Postmaster General, then the contract goes to the party so carrying it, and so on. So the thing is open to competition, and will establish a system which will break up the monopolies that have heretofore existed in this Department of the Government.

What are the facts in regard to the present system? According to the present rates, for twenty-five days we pay about $850,000. What is proposed by this bill? We propose to pay for sixteen days—ten days shorter time—according to this schedule, $850,000.

I ask the question, is it not important, considering the condition of the country and our relations, foreign and domestic, that we have rapid and speedy communication with our Pacific frontier? I ask if it is not important to every interest of the Government that this should be done? In view of this fact—in view of the great need of having an additional oceanic or overland route, which shall give us rapid and speedy communication between the Atlantic States and our Pacific possessions—I have drawn up and presented to the House this bill, not however without having consulted with some of the best men in the country in regard to this matter. It is not presumed that we shall soon have a trip made from New Orleans to San Francisco in ten days, nor from any part of the United States, until the Pacific railroad is established. I am so certain that this road will be built that I have made a provision for that event.

Mr. GREY. Will not the gentleman from Tennessee yield the floor to allow me to make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole? The bill will come up tomorrow, when he can finish his remarks.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. GREY. With that understanding I then move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken on Mr. Grey's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Orr in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration House bill No. 48, being a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. CHANDLER, after a few preliminary remarks, proceeded to address the committee in opposition to the bill proposing to organize territorial governments for Nebraska and Kansas. He was not afraid to trust to the righteousness of his cause. He welcomed all who assisted him with their speech or vote. He thought proper to say the opponents of this bill are absolved from all necessity of discussing the subject of slavery in connection with its provisions. Negro-mania or negro-phobia, or certain sentiments or degrees of sentiments, have necessarily nothing to do with the issue on this measure. It was a question of contract, honor, and faith of the white man with the white man. Whatever the benefits or injuries conferred or inflicted on negroes, Congress never made a contract with them, nor made any compromise to which the negroes were directly a party. The question was, shall the compromise of 1820 be maintained or violated? The same spirit which prompted the compromise of 1820 and 1850 was yet in existence, and the same motives will give that spirit constant action. The compromises of the Constitution remain. It was difficult to get at them. They were not to be reached simply by a legislative enactment.

The act of 1820 was and is a compromise. With a full knowledge of what was said and done during the Congress of 1850, he remarked, in whatever was uttered or committed at that time, there was nothing to create the suspicion that the five acts, known as the compromise of that session, intended to set aside or repeal the Missouri compromise.

Mr. BAYLY said he meant to take issue with the gentleman on that point.

Mr. CHANDLER, resumed. Had it been supposed on the part of those who yielded to the compromise that the five measures repealed the Missouri compromise, those bills would have been voted on the table, or, what is the same thing, put on the Calendar, where they would have been forgotten.

The principle of the compromise of 1820 remains in force, and there could be no positive enactment repealing its binding force without an outrage on public sentiment and the confidence reposed in congressional faith.

Nebraska shows no signs of life. The bill was only preparatory. The assertion of the doctrine that the people in the Territories have the right to regulate their own affairs was in direct opposition to the provisions of the bill, which he proceeded to show. He combatted this principle, saying young America, like young Israel, scouted the results of age and experience, exclaiming, in the language of Scripture, "go up, old baldhead, go." [Laughter.]

He further pursued his argument, showing, in the course of his remarks, the deplorable effects which the bill would have on the Indians residing in the Territory over which it was now proposed to spread territorial government; and, in conclusion, called on the opponents of the bill to stand fast to national faith and honor, and not be deterred from a conscientious course of duty by the sneers of those who differ from them in opinion. If they should fall, there will be inscribed on their tomb the Spartan epitaph: "We lie here in obedience to the commands of our country."

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, said that there were two Nebraska bills upon the Calendar, either of which he was willing to support. The bill, however, which he should principally discuss, was the one of the Senate, which he preferred; but, laying aside all technicalities in relation to the difference between the two measures, in effect, in principle, and in operation upon the Territories, as a southern man, he was willing to support either of them—whichever it should be the pleasure of the House to consider and adopt.

Prior to the passage of the compromise of 1850, we were at sea upon the subject of slavery, without compass or a friendly star to direct our course. By the passage of those measures, a principle was established, which, if adhered to, could be rallied around, in all time to come, by the friends of State rights and the perpetuity of the Union. That principle was congressional non-interference in the domestic affairs of the States and Territories. It was because of the incorporation of this principle of self-government in this bill that he gave it his cordial support; and he was free to declare, that he wished to see it recognized and established by the Government, to be referred to in all future time, when sectional difficulties might arise in the legislation of the country.

Having referred to the objections urged against the bill, he contended that it does not propose to repeal the Missouri compromise of 1821, but that it does repeal the Missouri restriction of 1820; that the eighth section of the act of March 6, 1820, was no compromise, because it wanted the essential element of mutual concession; that the Missouri act of 1820 was unconstitutional and void; and that, in order to bolster it up, it had been conjoined with the Missouri compromise of 1821, or the purpose of attaching to it the name and influence of Henry Clay.

He then adverted to the arguments against the Badger proviso, and declared that the true meaning and the whole effect of this clause was to prohibit the revival of any law which existed in the Territory prior to 1820, the force and effect of which was destroyed by the Missouri restriction. This proviso could have no effect whatever.

He then replied to portions of the speech of Mr. FRANKLIN, heretofore delivered, and proceeded to argue at length that the institution of slavery was protected by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the country.

[This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. NICHOLS said that he would not vote for this Nebraska bill, nor any other which contains a proviso to repeal the Missouri compromise, or which contains the Clayton amendment. He then proceeded to give historical details connected with the question, in support of his opposition to the measure, and continued his remarks until the expiration of the hour to which he was limited in debate. [See Appendix for speech.]

[A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed sundry private bills, in which it asked the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield the floor for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, at some length opposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and replied to arguments which had been advanced in support of the Nebraska bill, declaring that he should never vote to extend the area of slavery. [See Appendix for speech.]

Mr. PRESTON obtained the floor.

Mr. DEAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield the floor to enable me to make a motion for the committee to rise?

Mr. PRESTON. With pleasure.

Mr. DEAN. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. HAVEN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon, at a quarter past four o'clock, p. m., adjourned to to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

The President signed the last-named bill.

MARTIN KOSZTÁ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 14th ultimo, a report of the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of the correspondence between the American Consul at Smyrna, and the American legation at Constantinople, and also between the said consul and the United States Government, on the subject of the seizure of Martin Kosztá by the Austrian authorities; which on motion by Mr. MASON, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. EVERETT presented resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of Dedham, Massachusetts protesting against the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the introduction of slavery into territory now free; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens residing or traveling in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPER WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Michael Nash be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to establish a western arsenal at Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

HARRIET LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, on last private bill day I asked for the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives "for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth;" but, at the request of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] I yielded in order that the deficiency bill might be considered. I ask the consent of the Senate now to take up the bill to which I refer.

Mr. MASON. If any discussion arises on that bill I shall be obliged to ask that it lie over.

Mr. FOOT. If any debate arises, I shall consent that it be laid aside. I have only to say that this is a House bill, and that it has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Harriet Leavenworth upon the pension rolls, and cause her to be paid the sum of thirty dollars per month, for the term of five years, commencing February 1, 1853.

Henry Leavenworth forsook a lucrative practice at the bar, in New York, and entered the United States Army as captain of the ninth infantry, during the war of 1812. He was promoted major August 15, 1813; breveted lieutenant colonel July 5, 1814, for distinguished and meritorious services in the battle of Chippewa; breveted colonel July 25, 1814, for gallant conduct in the battle of Niagara, in which he was wounded; retained as major in the second infantry, peace establishment of 1815; promoted lieutenant colonel in the fifth infantry, February 10, 1818; breveted brigadier general July 25, 1824, for ten years' service in one grade; promoted colonel in the third infantry, December 16, 1825; and died at Cross Timbers, Southwestern Territory, July 21, 1834, while commanding the troops in that quarter. During this long continuance in the Army, he performed numerous and highly important services to his country—having established military posts in the Indian country, and at one time commanded a military expedition against the Aricara Indians. He stood high in the estimation of the Secretary of War, for prudence, courage, and civic as well as military attainments. He came to his death from bilious remittent fever, contracted while in the line of his duty as commander of an expedition against the Pawnee Picts, but his death was hastened by anxiety of mind, and a too arduous desire to advance the objects of his country intrusted to his command. Harriet Leavenworth, his widow, is advanced in age, in infirm health, and has pecuniary claims pressing upon her, which she is unable to meet.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF HOUSE BILLS.

The bill from the House of Representatives to authorize the selection of school districts in lieu of the sixteenth sections within the twelve miles square reservation, State of Alabama, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The joint resolution explanatory of the second section of a resolution "to establish certain post routes," approved July 12, 1852, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MILWAUKIE COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill "to extend the limits of the collection district of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes." It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce, and there is on file a letter from the Department showing its approval of the measure.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the limits of the collection district of Milwaukee so as to include the western shore of Lake Michigan, so far as it forms the boundary of Wisconsin, and all the waters of Green Bay, and to include all that portion of Wisconsin lying east of the Wisconsin river, above the town of De Korra, and all east of a line running south from De Korra to the State line. Milwaukee is to remain the port of entry, and Green Bay is to be a port of delivery in the district of Milwaukee, in the same manner as it is now in the district of Mackinaw; and Ozaukee and Manitowoc are to be ports of delivery in the district of Milwaukee, for which places surveyors are to be appointed, to receive the same compensation as is provided in the act of March 2, 1831, for surveyors at Pittsburg, Wheeling, and other places.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

JOSEPH SMITH.

Mr. STUART. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill for the relief of Joseph Smith. It is a matter which will not involve any discussion. It is to remedy a difficulty in the case of a land warrant.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize Joseph Smith to locate one hundred and sixty acres of land, on any of the public lands of the United States subject to private entry, in lieu of a location made by him which is specified in the bill, in the Kalamazoo land district, in Michigan, as assignee of military land warrant No. 55,099, and which location was canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and further to direct the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon the receipt of the certificate of location from the register of the proper land office, to issue a patent to him, for the lands so located.

On the 28th of April, 1849, a bounty land warrant was issued to William Hill, a private in Captain Wittenmeyer's company, in the first regiment of Michigan volunteers, in the war with Mexico. Prior to the issuing of the warrant on the 2d day of August, 1848, Hill departed this life, leaving no wife or children, or relatives, as appears from the certificate of the judge of the probate court for Cass county, Michigan; at the time of his decease he was indebted for expenses incurred during his last sickness in the sum of about $120, and left no personal property for its payment. On the 5th of October, 1848, one Charles S. Clowes was duly appointed administrator of the estate, and he, on the 15th of December, 1849, as administrator, and under the order of the probate judge, sold and assigned the warrant to Joseph Smith, and applied the money thus realized to the liquidation of the indebtedness of Hill, and expenses of administration; the warrant was located by Smith upon the west half of the southwest quarter of section twenty-five, and the east half of the southeast quarter of section twenty-six, in township seven south, of range fifteen west, in the Kalamazoo land district, Michigan, which location was canceled by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in May, 1851, on the ground that the warrant issued after the death of Hill; this decision was undoubtedly correct under the law. But in consideration of the fact that Hill was justly and legally entitled to the warrant, and left no relatives to whom a warrant could issue, and as Smith was an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, and the money thus realized applied to the payment of a sacred indebtedness, it was thought that equity would demand the relief prayed for by the petitioner, as no injustice would be done thereby to the United States.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 6, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE BLACK WARRIOR AFFAIR.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a message in writing received from the President of the United States, transmitting, in further compliance with the resolution of the House, a report from the Secretary of State, with the accompanying documents.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the report of the Secretary of State,

Mr. DEAN. Mr. Speaker, as these papers relate to the seizure of the Black Warrior, at Havana, called for by a resolution of this House, and as the former papers received on the same subject have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed, I move the same reference and order in relation to the papers now before us.

It was so ordered.

STEAM FRIGATES.

The following bill was reported from the Committee on Enrolled Bills as correctly enrolled, and received the signature of the Speaker:

An act to authorize the construction of six first-class steam frigates, and for other purposes.

TRANSPORTATION OF CALIFORNIA MAIL.

The SPEAKER. The matter first in order before the House is the bill reported yesterday by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, being "A bill to empower the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco according to time."

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will it be necessary for me, Mr. Speaker, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up that bill which was before us yesterday?

The SPEAKER. There being no motion to commit the bill, under the rules it goes to the Speaker's table.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up that bill.

General assent was expressed by the House.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Mr. Speaker, when I gave way yesterday to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY,] for the purpose of enabling the House to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I was going on to speak of the advantages which the establishment of the principle contained in this bill would bring to the Government, and the great revolution which it would work on our mail arrangements—in the mail system of the Government. Under its present operation that system is inadequate to supply the wants of the business community; and the consequence is, that a deficit arises in the mail revenue. The object of this Department of the Government is to make it a self-sustaining Department. Gentlemen here talk about economy, and we have economists in this House, and good ones too. But there are different notions of economy. We had a proposition submitted the other day by the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] proposing to increase the mail postage of the country to five cents instead of three cents. For what, sir? In order that the mail revenue of the country may be sufficient to defray the expenses of that Department of the Government.

I ask is this necessary? Is this the proper mode to redress or to eradicate that evil? It is not. Let us, Mr. Speaker, rather place that Department in a condition that will enable it to compete successfully with individual enterprise, and that it may be able to command the patronage of the business public alike with individual enterprise.

Sir, I propose by this bill no monopoly. I propose merely to place the Government, or that branch of the Government, on an equality with individual enterprises in the way of express lines. If this is once done, you will have no more talk of deficiencies in the revenue of the Post Office Department, but the consequence will be an ample revenue. And afterwards, if no one else should make the motion, and if I should have the honor of a seat here, I will propose to reduce the postage to one half its present rates.

But I am told on some occasions that we had better adopt the contract system, and let out the ocean mail carriage by contract. What is this proposition, sir? It is to carry the mails according to time. The longer the time the less the pay; the less the time the greater the pay, up to a given reasonable amount. What will be the result if this system is adopted, and this bill shall pass? Why, when the mail contracts are to be let, when proposals are issued by the Postmaster General, in future, he will advertise that proposals will be received for carrying the mails from point to point—say from New York to Liverpool, if you please—according to time, as per schedule annexed. The bidders will then put in their proposals, each with a schedule of price, according to time, attached; and the Postmaster General will have the selection of the lowest bidder according to time. Such will be the operation of the measure, if it shall please the House to adopt it.

It is said that the mere saving of a few days—and that, too, by high authority, by our able Postmaster General—is of importance but to a small portion of the community; that the agricultural portion receives but little benefit from it, while the cities and the commercial interests of the country receive the advantages.

I admit, sir, that the mercantile community will at first receive, perhaps, the greatest amount of this advantage, and the largest benefit. But, as Carlyle says, "commerce is the king." I admit it, but agriculture wears the crown. The one cannot exist without the other. Advance the interest of one, and you advance that of the other. They are inseparably connected in interest; there is such a unity of interest, that if one perish, so will the other. You may as well say that you could undertake to fatten the arm of a man without fattening the whole system, as to say you could benefit one branch or interest of the country without benefiting all. The argument which maintains that a saving of time is of no importance is fallacious and untenable; the saving of time, in this respect, is of as much importance as it is in any other enterprise where labor is the basis.

This bill is surrounded with proper guards and restrictions, as the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads seem to think; for I believe they have reported favorably upon it. I take it that it is so; and allow me to say, that it is an able committee, and the House has confidence in it. Having looked into this bill, I have offered a substitute, containing the same principle, and have thrown around it sufficient guards and restrictions to protect the interests of the Government. What are its provisions? The Postmaster General recommends, in his letter to that committee, or rather speaks in that letter, of the necessity of weekly mails from the United States to California. What does this bill propose? To give a weekly mail in connection with lines already established, to and from California. What else? Does it propose to advance the funds of the Government in order to carry out this contract, as has been done on former occasions? No, sir. Does it propose to take the vessels off the hands of the contractors for war purposes, or any other? No, sir. It merely proposes to test the principle of rapid and economical communication which is contained in it, at the expense of whoever may undertake to execute the contract.

It is expressly provided in the bill that the Postmaster General is not authorized or empowered to make any advance of the funds or credit of the Government in furtherance or aid of the undertaking, or for the use and benefit of the parties so contracting. And it still further provides that the parties so contracting shall in no event receive from Government increased compensation.

I need hardly allude to the large additional compensation which was made by the last Congress to a magnificent line of steamers for carrying the mail; but a like occurrence is provided against in this case.

It is again provided that the contract shall be taken, and continue for a term of ten years. It may be said that this will be giving some one company a monopoly for that length of time; but if gentlemen will examine another portion of the bill, they will see that such a monopoly is not granted.

And why? If it shall be ascertained that any other party can carry it in a less space of time than the contracting party, the contracting party is to be superseded by the said other party, who shall agree to carry the mail in a shorter space of time; and the former party is not, under any circumstances, to be allowed to claim anything in the shape of damages. Here is the provision as it is contained in the bill:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if at any time during the existence of this contract, any other individuals or company shall establish a more speedy conveyance of the mails between New Orleans and San Francisco, and shall give proof to the Postmaster General that said conveyance has been in successful operation for three consecutive months, then and in that case it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to transfer this contract to said individual or company, whereupon the former company or individual shall not be deemed to have any claim for damage, or otherwise, against the Government."

Now, sir, the magnitude and importance of this proposition I hope will secure the earnest attention of the members of this House. We are told every day nearly that the mail facilities of the country are inadequate to the wants of the country. We are told that the revenue of the Department is falling off, and that if this state of things is continued for any length of time, Congress will either be forced to place the Department in a position where it can defend itself, where it can compete successfully with lines established by private enterprise, or they will be forced to pay the expenses of maintaining these facilities from the Treasury of the people, or to abandon the whole service to the care of private individuals. One of these consequences will inevitably follow, unless we can devise some measure, some plan by which we may impart life, vigor, and a healthful action to this branch of our national service.

Sir, is it not a matter of the highest importance that the arteries and veins which convey the life-blood of the Government from its center to its circumference should be in a healthful condition? Is it not of vital importance that we keep a watchful eye upon the healthful condition of the blood which flows through the arteries and veins of the country, in the way of postal arrangements?

Why, sir, in England, where they have reduced their rates of postage to a mere nominal sum, the revenue derived from the service of that department is enormous. It is needless to tell me that the amounts appropriated in this bill are extravagant. The sum proposed to be appropriated is large; but if you will take into consideration the amount of time which will be saved to the business community, it will prove a great saving to the country by adopting this bill. At any rate, it is worth trying by way of testing the principle. I admit that it is but an experiment, but it is one which is worthy of being tested, even at some expense.

But it requires no expense. I propose to test the principle at the expense of whoever may be disposed to make the contract, or accept the proposition. It will require, I admit, some man of nerve, and with large means. It was remarked to me this morning that my bill would probably fail from this consideration; that it was confined exclusively to the Tehuantepec route. I wish it distinctly understood that, if the Tehuantepec route is the shortest, and the mails can be carried over it the quickest, then it is the route which I favor. In such case that is the route of the bill. If the Nicaragua is the quickest route, very well. If any other route is the quickest make a contract for it. I desire it to be distinctly understood that the bill provides for no particular route; it only refers to the shortest route and the quickest time.

What else do I propose by this bill? Without putting the Government to any expense, I propose to offer an inducement for the development of individual enterprise, and the power of steam. We have the elements in the country; and the importance of rapid communication with our western frontier, makes it necessary that we should adopt some measure by which we can derive that advantage, if it can be done without enormous expenditure of the public money.

I said that this was a mere business transaction. Looking at it in that point of view, we can readily conclude the cost and probable profit attending the execution of the contract. No individual who will take the bill and make the calculation, looking to all the results, both beneficial and adverse, but what will come to the conclusion that it is at least worthy of a test, especially when it would not cost the Government anything.

But I have already detained the House longer than I intended. The matter is one of considerable importance, at least I think so; and I trust that I have been able to convince the House it is worthy of their consideration.

It may be said that there is nobody in the country who is willing to undertake the contract. I have been informed that such is not the fact; that it will be readily accepted, and cause competitors from all sections of the Union, with ample means and gigantic intellects in their way, ship builders and ship owners, men of experience and who have patriotism and fortune enough to embark in the enterprise. They will test the principle without asking of the Government a single dollar.

If sufficient attention has already been given to the bill, it is not strange if I ask that it have an early passage; but I do not desire to put it on its passage at once, unless such may be the pleasure of the House. It has been published in this morning's Globe, and every gentleman has had an opportunity to look into it; and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have reported favorably on it. If it be not the pleasure of the House to consider it at once, I shall ask that its consideration be postponed for ten days.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman has submitted a motion which cuts off debate; and as I desire to be heard on the subject, I trust that he will withdraw it, and yield me the floor.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I do not desire a postponement, if I can get a vote on it now. I yield the floor to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone is withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, it has been a very common remark throughout the country that much of the gravest and most important business of this House is transacted without a knowledge on the part of its members of what is being done; and the consideration of the bill now before the House, and in reference to which we have had an able discourse from the gentleman who has introduced it, has been conducted amidst such bustle and noise as not to command the least attention.

Sir, I deem it one of the most important bills that has been presented to the country for many a long day, and I really think the House ought to give to it some consideration and attention during the time of its exposition, at least, by those who have had it under consideration. It is known to the House that the old practice which has prevailed in reference to contracts has not been in conformity with the impatient and progressive spirit of the age. Persons make contracts now-a-days, and you cannot make improvements on them with regard to speed without large additions to the expenditures.

I have the experience of a single contract in my own district, in which the time under the contract made at a former letting was twenty-nine hours, and the necessity for increased expedition upon that route has actually induced the contractor upon it to agree to a reduction of the time to twelve hours. I mention this fact for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to what is well understood by every gentleman at all familiar with the subject, that it is absolutely necessary that a new principle should be introduced—the principle to which I have referred, and which is embodied in the bill of the gentleman who last addressed us—a bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. That principle is in perfect harmony with the spirit of the age. What is it? Why, it is to let contracts for mail service, to be paid for according to its expedition. It is to introduce a new principle, which has been introduced by individual expressmen—that of getting the shortest time in the transmission of intelligence that human effort can accomplish.

But we know—it is in the knowledge of every member of the House—that the proverbial delays of the mails have excited the indignation to a very great extent of the people of the country. Everybody knows that; and it is that fact to which we are indebted for the repeated diminution of the receipts from that branch of the public service. Everybody is familiar with that.

Well now, what does the gentleman propose by this bill? I beg the attention of the House to it. He proposes to pay a sum progressively higher as the time is progressively diminished. If the mail is carried within a certain number of days between here and San Francisco, so much is to be paid; if in a certain number of days less, so much increase of compensation is to be allowed.

Now that furnishes a very good rule to go by, and I ask the House to look at the question. Why, when I went to California in 1850, I had a glorious trip—a frolic all the way, I may say—not an obstruction of any description to interrupt the passage, and what was the consequence? I was thirty-six days on the passage. But what has been the effect of rivalry and competition since that time? Now, the time has been reduced until the trips average twenty-five days, and sometimes the voyage is performed in even less time. Here is a prodigious gain to the country. Just make a calculation of the difference between thirty-six and twenty-five days in the interest on the money regularly exported from California to this portion of the Republic, and see what an enormous sum it amounts to. The difference of the interest on $50,000,000 a year between thirty-six days and twenty-five days constitutes a most important item in the industrial relations of the country. Every one can see that.

Well, we have realized twenty-five days as the ordinary average time of the trips between this and San Francisco. What is the project proposed by this bill? We are now paying for this expedition of the mail service—which seldom comes within the period of twenty-five days, and is frequently up to thirty days—eight hundred and odd thousand dollars a year. Yes, the transportation of the mails between this and San Francisco, at a speed of twenty-five days, costs this country upwards of $800,000.

What is proposed by this bill? Is it proposed that if it cannot be done in twenty-five days, that it shall be done for $840,000? If nobody will undertake to do it for less than twenty-five days, they can only get $10,000 a year, instead of $840,000. I wish it distinctly understood that this is $10,000 a year. If you can get it done in twenty-four days, what does it amount to? Ten thousand dollars a year. If gentlemen will look in the Globe, they will find that I am right in the statements I make. If no one will undertake to carry the mails for less than twenty-five days, they get but $10,000 a year. If no one undertakes to do it for less than twenty-four days, they still get, according to the printed report, $10,000 a year; and if no one will undertake it for less than twenty-three days, they get $20,000. I will read the whole schedule. It proposes:

In 25 days.....	$10,000 per annum.
In 24 days.....	10,000 "
In 23 days.....	20,000 "
In 22 days.....	30,000 "
In 21 days.....	40,000 "
In 20 days.....	50,000 "
In 19 days.....	100,000 "
In 18 days.....	250,000 "
In 17 days.....	450,000 "
In 16 days.....	850,000 "
In 15 days.....	1,000,000 "
In 14 days.....	1,250,000 "
In 13 days.....	1,300,000 "
In 12 days.....	1,400,000 "
In 11 days.....	1,500,000 "
In 10 days.....	1,600,000 "

We are now paying $850,000 for the mail delivered to us at even twenty-five and twenty days. Here is a proposition, however, to deliver it here in sixteen days for less money. I ask this House if it is not plainly their duty to adopt the principles of the bill that effects such an increase of facilities, and the saving of time and money? You reduce the time to sixteen and twenty-five days; thereby not only effect a great saving to the traveling community in time, but to the commercial and business interests of the country you will save a very great amount of interest. What objection can there be to such an arrangement? I know of one gentleman—I allude to a distinguished steamboat man in New York, Mr. Vanderbilt, who has won for himself by common courtesy the sobriquet of commodore—who is willing to undertake such a contract; and in steamboat matters he never fails. He is willing not only to undertake such a contract as this, but what is more, he is perfectly willing, if any man can beat him, to give up his contract. To start such a line as would be necessary for the purpose we all have in view, would require an expenditure of millions. Commodore Vanderbilt says that he will surrender all the advantages which are to be realized from the contract, if he does not fulfill it. I ask, then, what objection is there to the proposition? He does not claim a monopoly of the contract for ten years; and although there is a proposition giving the contract for that time, yet there is a stipulation that if anybody during that time can do it better, that the original contractor shall be superseded; nay, more, superseded, too, without any cost or charge to the Government. He is to surrender his contract because he does not keep up with the progressive spirit of the age. What objection can there be to this course, I ask? It is a contract to pay no enormous charge for an inadequate consideration, but it is a contract to pay for substantial value received. By adopting this course you will place this matter of mail contracts upon the true principle, which should be the only test for mail contracts—the time in which the service is to be performed. Then you will find this Government moving ahead in strict accordance with the progressive spirit of the age, and the great improvements developing in the country.

What objection can there be to this? Who can object to it? I ask this House again, I appeal to gentlemen, to support the principle embraced in this bill. Here, sir, is an important principle at issue. I cannot estimate its value too highly. It is deeply interesting to the country. It will cause the mails to be delivered to us with greater rapidity than usual. It will cause them to be delivered at a less rate than the ordinary one. It will, in every point of view, enable the Government to keep pace with individual enterprise.

It will place this great arm of the public service under the responsibility of quick operations. I ask, then, on what principle it can be objected to. Look to your steamers carrying the mails over the Atlantic, as they have been referred to by the gentleman who preceded me. Suppose we annulled that contract, and threw the service open to competition on the principle of this bill. Instead of having but one line of steamers, the pampered pet of this Government, we would have, perhaps, half a dozen lines struggling for supremacy; and perhaps the carrying of the mails would be sometimes transferred from the one line to the other. Instead of having a single great monopoly on the Atlantic ocean, we would perhaps have a general circulation of half a dozen competing lines.

But, Mr. Speaker, the principle itself is right—the principle itself is economical—awakens all the fire and energy of American enterprise; it addresses itself to the favorable consideration of the whole country. And I conceive, that instead of our being startled by it and making objections to it, the wonder is, not that the system is now suggested, but that a principle that must strike all sensible men with obvious and conclusive force had not before been introduced and acted on in this House.

I say, then, that I hope the House will consider and adopt this bill, not because the principle is new—for change is not always an improvement—but because the principle is wise, and is, in every point of view, justly entitled to the favorable consideration of this House and of the country. I will not trouble the House with any further remarks; but ask the House to pass the bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. I would be glad to know, Mr. Speaker, whether or not, under the rules of the House, this bill does not require to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? I grant you it does not make a direct appropriation; but the remarks of my colleague [Mr. SMITH] satisfy my mind, at least, that this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole. I am free to admit, sir, that the principle involved in it is an important one.

Mr. CHURCHWELL, (interrupting.) I desire to say, if the gentleman from Virginia will permit me—

Mr. McMULLIN. What is the object of the gentleman?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire to ask the House to postpone the consideration of this bill for ten days.

Mr. McMULLIN. No. I will not agree to that proposition.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat to express my views in reference to this matter—

Mr. JONES, of New York, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me for one moment?

Mr. McMULLIN. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from New York for an explanation.

Mr. JONES. I will only detain the gentleman from Virginia for one moment. I wish to say to the House, as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, from which this bill is reported, that this bill has not been considered by that committee, as I understand it; and for myself I must say that in its present form I am much opposed to it; and, therefore, I trust that this House will not spring upon us this bill until it can be well understood.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire to make one single remark, and then I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will yield for an explanation, but not for a motion.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. JONES] say that this bill has been reported from the committee without having been considered.

Mr. OLDS. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] yield to me for a moment for the purpose of explanation?

Mr. McMULLIN. Certainly.

Mr. OLDS. It becomes necessary and proper for me, inasmuch as my colleague upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. JONES, of New York], has spoken in reference to the action of the committee, to say a word in explanation. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the action of the committee, in saying that they have not considered the bill.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I do not wish to be misunderstood in my remarks. I believe that the committee as a committee, have not considered this bill, nor reported as a committee upon it. I so understand the matter. I do not say that the subject has not been talked over by us individually, but that as a committee we have not considered the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I will state what the action of the committee was upon the bill. I do not know whether my colleague upon the committee [Mr. JONES, of New York] was or was not present at the time the bill was up for consideration before the committee. The matter was taken up and considered by the committee; and the order of the committee was, that Mr. McDUGALL should report the bill back to the House with amendments; and it is my fault, perhaps, that the amendments, or all of them, are not in the bill, as they should be. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL], on Monday, handed me the bill to look over it, for the purpose of seeing whether it embraced the views of the committee. That was about the time we were entering into the discussion of the bill for the pay of postmasters, and I put the bill into my drawer, forgot to look at it, and handed it back to the gentleman without perusal.

But the order of the committee was to report back the bill to the House, with amendments. The amendments were to change the first section of the bill so as to authorize the Postmaster General to enter into a contract of this kind, upon the completion of the existing contracts for the transportation of mails upon that route, and to strike out of the schedule of time all after fourteen days. In this manner the committee acted, without pledging itself to vote for or against the bill when it should come up for consideration by the House. They were willing to report it back, as a bill containing merits, and allow it to be discussed by the House, and adopted or rejected, as they should see fit.

Mr. McMULLIN. This is not, Mr. Chairman, the first bill which, since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, has been precipitated upon the House for its action. Gentlemen who were here during the Thirty-First Congress know perfectly well what was said in relation to these matters at that time, and the course which was pursued then. They cannot have forgotten that they were assured by the then learned and distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that if the reduction of postage, which was then proposed, should be adopted, the whole country would be greatly benefited by that arrangement. We were also assured that the Post Office Department would become a self-sustaining Department. I did not believe in the principle and beneficial effects of a reduction then; and the facts which have since transpired have satisfied all, conclusively, that such belief was well founded. The Post Office Department of this Government is minus $2,000,000 now; and if you will confer with the head of that Department, you will find that the probability is that next year there will be a deficiency of $4,000,000.

It is not my purpose, at this time, to go into the consideration of the merits of this bill. Not at all. But, sir, since I have been a member of this House, I have seen that almost all the changes which have been made in the Post Office Department have resulted to the benefit of the large commercial cities, but to the ruin, almost, of the rural districts. What are the facts? In my own district, as also in almost all the rural districts in this country, you can scarcely get a postmaster to hold a commission six months, because of the reduction of their pay; and I express my belief that the operation of this bill will further cripple the postal arrangements of these districts.

It is due to all portions of the country that this important bill—conceded by its friends to be important—conceded by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] to be important—important as my colleague [Mr. SMITH] has fully shown to be to the House—should receive a full and careful consideration. The question is, will you give it that consideration in the House, or will you refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be fully, deliberately, and fairly considered?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. The gentleman speaks of the importance of the bill. I admit it; and ask him to be good enough to let it be recommitted to the committee, that they may consider it, and that its further consideration may be postponed indefinitely, or for two or three weeks.

Mr. McMULLIN. Before I take my seat, I will endeavor to answer my friend from Tennessee, for I assure him there are but few members upon this floor whom I would sooner accommodate than him.

But while I am upon the floor I desire to call the attention of the House to one fact. Ask every member upon this floor, and they will tell you that the reduction of the rates of postage has worked nothing but ruin upon the revenues of the Post Office Department, and I am not prepared to say that if you adopt this bill it will not result in still further liabilities upon that Department. I have not sufficiently examined it to prepare me to say definitely, however, what will be its operation in this respect.

But, sir, although it is said that this bill has met the approbation of a majority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I must beg to tell the House that I know one member of that committee, from Virginia, [Mr. POWELL], did not sanction it, nor, if I understand it, was he consulted upon the subject.

Again, sir, I would like to see the Post Office Department a self-sustaining branch of the Government. I do not want my district, and other districts which are like mine, situated in the interior of the country, cut down in their mail facilities, and then called upon to contribute to support those facilities for the benefit of the great commercial cities of the country.

I am, for one, perfectly willing that Congress should pass a law—and I believe it is the duty of Congress to pass such a law—as shall make the Post Office Department a self-sustaining branch of the Government. I am perfectly willing that my district should contribute its share towards meeting the burdens of the Government; but I am not willing, when that is done, that you should increase your postal facilities between the great commercial cities to two mails a day, while in the rural districts of the country they cannot get more than two mails per week, and, in many instances, not more than one a week.

But, sir, it is not my purpose to trespass upon the time of the House, but move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the friends of the bill prefer that it should be recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I will not object to that disposition of it.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McMULLIN. No, sir; my friend wants, I know, to postpone the further consideration of this bill for three weeks; but I cannot consent to make, or to allow him to make, that motion.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment for personal explanation?

Mr. McMULLIN. Certainly, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I am forced to believe that my friend from Virginia was not in the House during the early proceedings of the day, for he certainly has not understood the position I assumed in debate, or my argument upon the bill. I agree with my friend in his idea that the Post Office Department should be a self-sustaining branch of the Government. I agree with him that we should increase the mail facilities in his own rural district and mine. I desire to see daily mails established in those more sparsely settled portions of the country. I wish to see the Department placed in a condition in which it may defend itself against the competition of private enterprise; against express lines established by private individuals. I know that our community need additional postal facilities, and my object is to increase the revenue of the Department, so as to secure in his southwestern Virginia, and in my own native Tennessee, daily mails over that mountain country.

A MEMBER. If you receive weekly mails there you will do well.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Perhaps so; but I shall not be satisfied with weekly; I want to see daily mails there; and I could show that the effect of this bill would, to a certain extent, have an effect in that direction, for it will be to increase the revenue of the Department.

Now, sir, inasmuch as this is an important bill, requiring further consideration, and inasmuch as other gentlemen desire to speak upon it, I ask my honorable friend from Virginia that he will allow me to make the motion that its further consideration be postponed for three weeks, and not to send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—where it will never be heard of again, perhaps for the next one hundred years—to a long home. I know that my friend cannot be so cruel to the only bantling which I have before the body. [Laughter.] He professes to love me; and if he does, then he certainly cannot treat my measure harshly. [Laughter.] He will surely let the poor bantling live for three weeks. Then, if there be nothing in it, the bill will die. When it dies, I shall go with it to the grave, and a tear, if it be the only one, shall fall on its bier. If the benevolence of my friend will allow me, I now submit the motion that the consideration of the bill be postponed for three weeks.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is still on the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have no doubt that my distinguished friend from Tennessee believes all that he has said in regard to the practical view of this measure.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. A good deal more.

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman says a good deal more. I remember perfectly well that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the Thirty-Second Congress, was equally as sincere as my friend from Tennessee in the belief that the then reduction of the postage would not seriously affect the revenues of the Post Office Department. He was mistaken, and my friend may also be mistaken.

My friend says that I love him. I respect him as one gentleman does another. I love my friend well, but I love my country more. [Laughter.] If the question be one of the paramount importance claimed, why not give it the direction that all important bills take? Let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There all the gentlemen who desire to speak on it, for or against it, will have a fair field and a clear sky. I propose to give the bill that direction. I propose to send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it will not be lost. I shall go with the gentleman to resurrect it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. With the gentleman's permission, I would ask the Chair whether a motion has been made that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The motion has not been made.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would be glad then if the gentleman from Virginia would make that motion.

Mr. McMULLIN. I now yield for the purpose of explanation to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. When will the morning hour expire, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. At ten minutes past one.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. The gentleman has entirely misunderstood the character of the bill. In all candor I would inquire of him whether he has read the bill?

Mr. McMULLIN. I have read a portion of it in the newspaper. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHURCHWELL. A portion of it! I have but one more proposition to make to my friend from Virginia. Will he agree to make the bill a special order? He professes to love me next to his country. I imagine I have a high place in his affections. [Laughter.] Will the gentleman agree to make the bill a special order?

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot agree to do so.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Then I hope the House will agree to postpone its consideration for two weeks. If it be the pleasure of gentlemen, let the postponement be for three weeks.

Mr. McMULLIN. I should like to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee, but I have a duty to perform, from which I cannot swerve. Gentlemen on various sides desire that I shall afford the bill a fair and full consideration. The gentleman from Tennessee desires to know whether I had read the bill. What time have I had to read it? It was this morning, for the first time, published in the Globe, and laid upon our tables. I looked over it very hastily, and the remarks of the honorable gentleman, and of my worthy colleague from Virginia, induced me to get the floor for the purpose of submitting a proposition to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for full, free, and fair consideration. If there is a majority in favor of the bill, it can be taken up at any time, and I assure the friends of the bill that I will aid them to take it up at the proper time. I therefore move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on that I call the previous question.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire simply to state, that if the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will never be taken up; for, as is usual and customary, the whole time when we are in committee will be occupied in discussing Nebraska, or some other question. I hope, therefore, that the House will vote down the motion to refer the bill, and postpone its consideration for three or four weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the previous question withdrawn?

Mr. McMULLIN. It is not.

The SPEAKER. Then debate is out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PHELPS. Before the question is put upon that motion, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back the deficiency bill.

No objection was made.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the deficiency bill with sundry amendments.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREENWOOD, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill to be entitled an act to enable the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Mississippi, to apply a portion of the swamp lands granted to each, respectively, to aid in the construction of the St. Louis, Helena, and New Orleans railroads.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 4th instant, transmitting all the information in the possession of the Department touching the expediency of an appropriation by Congress to defray the expenses already incurred, and that may hereafter be incurred, in the prosecution of the persons engaged in the destruction of the Martha Washington.

Mr. ORR. The document seems to be a very long one, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. That order will be made, no objection being made.

A communication was then laid before the House, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of the Department of the Interior from the 1st of July, 1852, to the 30th June, 1853, as required by the act of 26th August, 1842; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HESTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen are calling for the question upon the motion submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, and it must now be put.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration House bill No. 48, being a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855, upon which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PRESTON] is entitled to the floor.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. PRESTON alluded to the fact that there are two bills in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, proposing to organize territorial governments for Nebraska and Kansas, and pointed out the main differences between the two measures. That from the Senate contains what is known as the Badger amendment and the Clayton amendment, and both contain a common provision which declares that the act known as the Missouri compromise is rendered inoperative by the measures of 1850.

These bills, he said, in the course of his remarks, propose equal rights to the people of the slaveholding, and equal rights to those of the non-slaveholding States, to settle in Nebraska and Kansas, and organize their own government. He was in favor of this principle. As to the power of Congress to interdict slavery in the Territories, he did not think it exists. You can find precedents in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that Congress possesses plenary power over the Territories. But if Congress possesses this power, they ought not to exercise it, because the settlement of the question of slavery ought to be delegated to the people who are to inhabit the Territories.

He conceived that the Badger amendment neither helps nor hurts in this matter. On the face of the bill that Senator made a conclusive argument that it does not alter the terms of the bill as it was originally introduced in the Senate. As a southern man, he asked for no reestablishment of slavery by implication in Nebraska, but simply the right to go there to meet his northern friend and brother, and with him establish the foundations of society, with or without slavery.

He gave his reasons why he should vote to strike out the Clayton amendment; and, towards the conclusion of his remarks, called on the North to render to the South the equality which has been so long denied. The advocates of the bill were not afraid of discussion; and it was his belief the bill will pass. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York, said that he was opposed to the Nebraska and Kansas bill which has come to us from the Senate, because

1st. It limits suffrage to white men.

2d. It limits suffrage to citizens.

3d. It is so drawn as to mislead readers into the belief that it recognizes the doctrine of non-intervention.

4th. It looks to the existence of slavery in those Territories, and provides safeguards for it.

5th. It allows that slavery may exist in the States that shall be formed from these Territories.

The hammer fell when Mr. S. was in the midst of his argument to prove that all American slavery is unconstitutional.

[Mr. S. retains for revision the report of his speech.]

Mr. CARUTHERS obtained the floor.

Mr. MILLER. Will my colleague yield me the floor for the purpose of making a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. CARUTHERS. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. MILLER. I then move that the committee rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the civil and diplomatic bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BISSELL. There are several bills from the Senate upon the Speaker's table, which it would be well, perhaps, to dispose of now, as it will take but a few minutes.

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon, at five minutes past three o'clock, p. m., adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 7, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform the Senator that this is private bill day.

Mr. MORTON. Exactly. That is the point to which I intend to speak. I presume it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to move to go into Executive session; but there is one private bill which I think will elicit no discussion, in which a constituent of mine is deeply interested. It is very important to him that the bill should pass through Congress as soon as possible. It is the bill for the relief of Manuel Hernandez. I will state to the Senate that if the bill should be taken up, and should elicit the least discussion, I shall be perfectly willing that it may be passed over.

Several SENATORS. This is objection day.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform the Senator that, under the rule, no bill can be discussed to-day, but with unanimous consent.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider that bill.

Mr. STUART. I desire to say to the Senator that I suppose the Senate will concur in proceeding to the consideration of private bills to-day, under the order; and the very fact that this is the day on which bills cannot be discussed, will show that by proceeding in order we can pass probably three fourths of the bills on the Calendar, and the Senator's bill with them.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to that course being pursued, but I understood the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] would move for an Executive session.

Mr. STUART. I hope not.

Mr. MASON. I understand if I move for an Executive session, any single objection will prevent it. Am I right in that construction of the rule?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; that is the construction which the Chair gives to the rule.

Mr. MASON. Then, sir, I will say that if there can be a common understanding that at one o'clock I may be allowed to move for an Executive session, I will not make the motion at an earlier moment. The Senate are aware that I think it necessary that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of public matters in Executive session; yet, if such an understanding can be arrived at, I will not make that motion until one o'clock.

Mr. SLIDELL. I do not wish to be understood as compromised at all by any agreement of that sort. I think we can dispose of a great many bills on the Calendar, for this is objection day; but if we shall not have reached some bills in which I am interested by one o'clock, I shall not feel at liberty to assent to the course suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MASON. I consider it my duty to move for an Executive session although it will supersede private business. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. PEARCE. I am not certain that I should object to the motion of the Senator from Virginia if I did not think it desirable, for reasons which I cannot now state, that the Senate should not proceed to the consideration of Executive business. I believe the public interests would be advanced by our proceeding with the private business to-day, leaving Executive business for to-morrow. The Senator therefore, I hope, will not think I am personal and discourteous if I object to proceeding to the consideration of Executive business to-day.

Mr. MASON. Does the Senator object?

Mr. PEARCE. I do.

The PRESIDENT. Then the Senate must proceed to the consideration of the private bills upon the Calendar.

JOHN G. MACKALL.

The first bill on the Calendar was one reported from the Committee on Claims, for the relief of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, deceased.

Mr. STUART. Is not that one of the bills which involves the question which was discussed the other day by the Senators from Maryland and Delaware?

The PRESIDENT. It is one of the same class of bills.

Mr. STUART. I think it had better be looked into.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM G. RIDGELY.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar is one for the relief of William G. Ridgely. It is one of the same class referred to by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

DAVID MYERLE.

The next bill was one, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. STUART. That is a controverted bill; let it go over.

MOORE AND HASCALL'S PATENT.

The next bill was one, reported from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall.

Mr. STUART. That is objected to by others, not by me.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

JOHN BRONSON.

The next bill was one for the relief of John Bronson, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EVANS. I should like to know why this claim has never been presented heretofore? It is always suspicious when a claim has stood for forty years.

The PRESIDENT. There is a report in the case. Does the Senator desire to hear it read?

Mr. EVANS. Yes, sir.

The report of the Committee on Claims was accordingly read.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think this is the bill which the Senator from Delaware discussed at some length the other day. I see now that he is in his place, and I wish to call his attention to it.

The PRESIDENT. If there be objection, the bill must be passed over.

Mr. CASS. I think there can be no objection. I have known the case for thirty-five years. It comes clearly within the rules which we have applied under similar circumstances; and I think no gentleman who examines it will object to it. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] reported the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I have a few words to say upon it.

The PRESIDENT. It is objected to; so the bill must go over.

THOMAS BUTLER.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Butler, reported from the Committee on Commerce, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Thomas Butler, of the city of New York, the sum of $2,922, being the cost of extra work performed, and materials furnished, in the construction of a light-house on Execution Rocks, in Long Island sound, by order of the engineer in charge, and not within the terms of a contract executed by Butler for the construction of that light-house.

On the 4th day of August, 1847, a contract was executed between Cornelius W. Lawrence, superintendent of light-houses, &c., in behalf the United States, and Thomas Butler, for the construction by Butler of a light-house on Execution Rocks, in Long Island sound. Among other things, it was provided by the terms of the contract, that the work should be done under the superintendence and direction of an engineer, to be appointed by Lawrence in behalf of the United States, and that the largest and most suitable of the several rocks composing the group called Execution Rocks, should be selected for the site of the building. The contract provided for the construction of the foundation as follows: "The rock not being of sufficient extent to receive the full size of the base building, the deficiency is to be made up with concrete, or split granite, well bedded in hydraulic cement." The working drawings, accompanying the specification, also show that the foundation was designed to be built of split stone. It appears by the evidence accompanying the memorial of Mr. Butler, that by the direction of the engineer appointed by the superintendent of light-houses to take charge of the work, hewn granite was substituted by the petitioner in the foundation for the split granite mentioned in the contract. This is distinctly proved by the testimony of William Brainerd.

The evidence presented establishes that the stone was cut by the direction of the engineer employed in behalf of the United States; that the cost of cutting it was twenty-five cents per superficial foot; and that the number of superficial feet cut was nine thousand and five hundred, making the cost of the extra work in cutting the stone, $2,375.

The petitioner claims payment for other items of extra work, and for materials furnished not included in the terms of the contract, viz:

For one iron ring, 23 feet in diameter, 2½ inches round, and letting in, cost.....	$160 00
One iron ring, 21 feet in diameter, 1½ inches round, and letting in, cost....	110 00
Four hundred pounds of copper dowels, put in lower courses, at twenty-five cents per pound.....	100 00
Drilling holes for the same in eight courses of stone.....	122 00
Iron clamps in basement and over windows.....	45 00

Total..... $547 00

It is clear that the petitioner was not required by the contract to furnish these materials and work. Besides other proof in support of the latter items of charge, the engineer who had the superintendence of the work during the latter portion of the time when the light-house was being constructed, certifies to the correctness of the charges for the extra work and materials, and states that they were of the utmost importance to the strength and safety of the light-house.

The petitioner has given reasons satisfactory to the committee why these charges were not presented in season to be paid out of the appropriation for the light-house. Mr. Norris, the engineer who originally had charge of the work, left for California, in December, 1848, after the foundations were laid, and the extra work charged for was performed, so that the petitioner could not obtain the necessary report or certificate from the engineer to enable him to obtain the allowance of his charges at the Treasury.

Mr. Butler also claims $2,000 for damages for delay of the work for nine months, on account of the site for the light-house not having been fixed by the United States; and the further sum of $588 charged to him by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and deducted from the amount payable by contract for extra time of the engineer employed to superintend the work. He has not presented satisfactory evidence in support of the latter claims; on the contrary, it appears from correspondence of the committee with the Fifth Auditor, that the delay in fixing the site for the light-house was caused by the petitioner. In the opinion of the committee, the two latter items should not be allowed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT R. E. COCHRANE.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Sally T. B. Cochrane, widow of the late Lieutenant R. E. Cochrane, United States Army, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill appropriates the sum of $150 to Mrs. Cochrane, the value of a horse belonging to Lieutenant Cochrane, which was used for express riding in the public service by order of Lieutenant Colonel Garland, United States Army, at Fort Smith, in 1841, and died in consequence of that service.

Lieutenant Colonel John Garland, of the fourth infantry, certifies that the horse was employed by him on public service to take an express from Van Buren to Fort Smith, Arkansas.

The claim is supported by the certificate of E. H. Abadie, assistant surgeon United States Army, who says, that whilst he was stationed at Fort Smith, Arkansas, seven companies of the fourth infantry, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel John Garland, arrived at that post from Fort Gibson, on the 19th September, 1841, en route for Florida. The same night they embarked on board the steamer Artizan, and left Fort Smith some time on the 20th. At a point below Van Buren, some fifteen miles, more or less, the boat was snagged, and sunk on a sand bar, where she grounded—unable to proceed further. On or about the 21st September, hearing of the situation of the boat and troops, Lieutenant R. E. Cochrane, acting assistant quartermaster at the post, and he, rode some seventeen miles across the woods, to where they lay. Lieutenant Cochrane riding his own horse, a fine, high-spirited animal, which had been sold a few weeks previous, Lieutenant Cochrane purchasing him. Whilst at the boat, Lieutenant Colonel Garland sent an express, a soldier, on Lieutenant Cochrane's horse, across to Van Buren; thence across the river again to Fort Smith, back to the boat. On starting to return to the fort, the same evening, it was apparent that Lieutenant Cochrane's horse was sick. With difficulty they got back to the garrison in a walk. Two hours after their return the horse was dead.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is a bill for the relief of the widow of a public officer, who served in the Mexican war, and died at Resaca de la Palma, I believe, or Palto Alto. It is for the loss of a horse, and the sum is only $150. I hope the Senate will pass it. The proof is ample. It has heretofore passed the Senate, and is now reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

THOMAS B. PARSONS.

The bill for the relief of Thomas B. Parsons, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay Thomas B. Parsons, who was disabled while in the naval service of the United States, in the successful effort to save the lives of seven persons, three dollars per month from the 1st of September, 1808, to the 1st of June, 1835, as the difference between the rate of pension of a seaman and that of a coxswain, which grade he filled at the time of the injury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

AMOS KNAPP.

The bill for the relief of Amos Knapp, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Amos Knapp a sum equal to eleven dollars per month from the 1st of July, 1848; and it increases his pension, granted by act of July 12, 1852, to the rate of eleven dollars per month, to continue during his natural life.

On the 12th of July, 1852, an act was passed, placing the name of petitioner on the pension rolls, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to take effect from its passage. By a certificate of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, it is proved that Knapp's papers, upon which the relief was finally granted, in 1852, were presented and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in April, 1848, with the exception of a certificate of Hon. A. M. Schermerhorn, that the signatures to his petition were genuine. The petitioner now prays that his pension may be made to commence at the time when he presented the evidence, with the exception referred to, upon which the act of 1852 was based.

The evidence is also clear, and of the highest character, (being of record as certified by Assistant Adjutant General Thomas, and by Third Auditor of the Treasury, Gallaher,) that Knapp was a sergeant (and not a private) in the thirty-first infantry of the war establishment of 1812; and, as such, as shown by the pay-tables, was entitled to and received eleven dollars per month. It also further is shown by the papers accompanying the petition, that he, while in the service and in the line of his duty, incurred rheumatism, which resulted, after his honorable discharge, in total disability.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

GEORGE MORELL.

The bill to provide compensation for the services of George Morell in adjusting titles to land in Michigan, reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Maria Morell, widow of George Morell, late a judge of the United States for the Territory of Michigan, for his services in ascertaining, adjusting, and settling claims to land, and performing other duties in conformity with several laws, at the rate of $500 per annum, from the time of his appointment as a judge of the United States for that Territory, to the 24th of September, 1836.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ABIGAIL STAFFORD.

The next on the Calendar was the joint resolution explanatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Abigail Stafford;" which had been reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BAYARD and Mr. BRIGHT objected to its consideration; and it was passed over.

BENEDICT J. HEARD.

The next on the Calendar was the bill for the relief of Benedict J. Heard; reported from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BAYARD. I have something to say on that.

The bill was passed over.

LYMAN N. COOK.

The bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Lyman N. Cook, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the name of Lyman N. Cook to be placed on the pension roll of the United States at the rate of $22 50 per month during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

ISRAEL JOHNSON.

Mr. RUSK. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to report a private bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is a small bill, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill was received by unanimous consent, read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Israel Johnson, of Cass county, Indiana, $570.

Johnson alleges that, at the time of the attempted treaty with the Miami tribe of Indians, in 1833, he, at the request, and under the direction of General William Marshall, Indian agent, and Nicholas D. Grover, sub-agent, hauled from Logansport to the forks of the Wabash, three loads of baggage, for which he was to receive $45 each, making $135 in all. Also, that, by the orders of the same parties, he hauled one load of baggage from the treaty ground at the forks of the Wabash, to the payment ground of the Pottawatomies, on the Tippecanoe river, for which he was to receive $45; also, being a hotel-keeper at Logansport, he entertained and kept a large number of Indians for some time prior to the attempted treaty, for which he charges $220; also, that, while the Indians were in council, he gave, by direction of the agent, a public dinner to the chiefs of the tribes, for which he charges $75; also, that he was employed to transport six boys of the Pottawatomie tribe to Madison, on their way to the Choctaw Academy, for which it was agreed that he should be paid $100. The evidence leaves no room to doubt the truth of the allegations. Among the affidavits, Mr. Grover, the sub-agent, who was on the ground, bears testimony to the service, and the reasonableness of the compensation.

When the accounts pertaining to the commission were presented by the agent of the United States, at the War Department, Johnson's accounts were omitted; and the omission is accounted for by the fact that upon the failure of the treaty, the commissioners hurriedly made up their accounts during the night following, and left their treaty ground early the next morning, while Johnson was absent from the ground. No part of the claim has been paid by the United States, but allowances for precisely similar services have been made to others in the settlement of the accounts of the commission.

The objection to the payment at the War Department is, that the accounts are not approved by the whole Board of Commissioners, three in number. The evidence before the committee shows that the agent for the Indians, General Marshall, from the fact that the other gentlemen on the commission were strangers to the Indians and the whites in the neighborhood, was the active and acting man, and made all the necessary arrangements.

It was through no fault of Johnson that the accounts were not laid before the board, but it was the result of the neglect of General Marshall, whose duty it was to have done so in Johnson's absence, as Marshall had required the services and been furnished with the accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

CAPTAIN HOOE.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Emelie Hooe, widow of Captain Hooe, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension list the name of Emelie Hooe, widow of Brevet Major Alexander S. Hooe, late of the United States Army, whose death was occasioned by a wound received in the battle of Resaca de la Palma, on the 9th of May, 1846, and allow her per month the half pay of a captain in the Army of the United States, for ten years, to commence on the 1st of January, 1854; but the pension is to cease if she die in the mean time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

UTICA STEAM WOOLEN COMPANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of the Utica Steam Woolen Company. It appropriates $1,181 16 to the Utica Steam Woolen Company, of Utica, in the State of New York, in full of their account for interest on goods furnished to the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. SHIELDS called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Claims, and it was accordingly read.

It appears that in 1851 the company made a contract with G. H. Crossman, quartermaster, in behalf of the United States, to furnish certain broadcloths, to be used for making clothing for the Army, and that they were to be paid from time to time, as the goods were delivered. The contract was fulfilled by the company; but, by reason of the late period at which the appropriation bills for that year were passed, the money was not ready until some time after the delivery of the cloths. The claim is for interest on the principal sum, from the time of the delivery of the goods, when the money, by the terms of the contract, became payable, to the time when the payment was actually made.

Mr. BRIGHT. It appears to me that there must be something wrong about this bill. This Government always has money enough in the Treasury to satisfy all demands of that kind; and I apprehend that, on looking into the matter, it will be found that the laches was on the part of the claimants. I object, therefore, to the consideration of this bill, until I can have an opportunity of looking into it.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

CAPTAIN PHILIP F. VOORHEES.

The next bill, which was one for the relief of Captain Philip F. Voorhees, United States Navy, was objected to by Mr. SLIDELL, and passed over.

OTWAY H. BERRYMAN.

The bill for the relief of Otway H. Berryman, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was objected to by Mr. STUART, and passed over.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar is one for settling the claim of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, deceased.

Mr. EVANS. I have looked into that case, and I desire that the bill may be passed over. The committee have allowed the man more than he is entitled to.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN S. WILSON.

The bill for the relief of John S. Wilson, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, was read a second time.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John S. Wilson the sum of $800, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the 17th of May, 1822, in full compensation to him for damages sustained by being evicted of his title, derived by patent from the United States, to the east half of section twenty-two and west half of section twenty-three, in township fifty-two north, of range one east, of the fifth principal meridian in the State of Missouri, by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States, in favor of the devisees of Auguste Choteau, at the January term in 1835.

Mr. BAYARD. I must move to amend that bill. I do not wish to discuss it, if the amendment can be adopted. I move to strike out the words "with interest thereon at the rate of six per centum per annum from the 17th day of May, 1822."

Mr. BADGER. Then I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My colleague, who is not here to-day, from indisposition, asked me to request that the bill might be laid over.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

HEZEKIAH JOHNSON.

The bill, from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Hezekiah Johnson, of the town of Bridgewater, in the State of Vermont, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to cause the name of H. Johnson to be placed upon the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st of January, 1853, and to continue during his life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, although this is objection day, as we call it, I hope there will be no objection to my making the usual motion that, when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT JAMES A. DEANY.

The bill, from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary Deany upon the pension rolls, and cause to be paid to her the sum of fifteen dollars a month, for ten years, commencing January 1, 1853; but in case of her marriage or death, the pension is to be paid to her two children, or the survivor of them.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment, to add the words "under sixteen years of age," so that the pension shall cease when the survivor attains that age.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read a third time, and passed.

AARON STAFFORD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Aaron Stafford.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Aaron Stafford on the roll of invalid pensioners, and to pay him at the rate of fifteen dollars a month, from and after the 4th of March, 1848, and to continue during his natural life, but all sums are to be deducted which he has received as an invalid pensioner since the 4th of March, 1848, and all acts heretofore passed for his relief are repealed.

The petitioner held a commission as adjutant on the 13th day of October, 1812, in the sixteenth detached regiment of the militia of New York, in the service of the United States, during the last war with Great Britain. In that capacity he volunteered on that day, with about two hundred men, to cross over from Lewiston to Queenstown, and he was engaged in the storming of Queenstown Heights, and in that battle on that day. While he was so engaged he received four severe and dangerous wounds—one above the right temple, from a musket ball; another from a bullet passing through his right thigh; a third from a musket ball in the left shoulder; and a fourth from a grape shot, in his left thigh. But, notwithstanding the first three wounds, he continued fighting, and urging on his men, until struck in the left thigh with a grape shot. The wound received by the grape shot was so severe that it knocked him down the bank of the Niagara river, about one third of the way to the water, and he was only saved from being precipitated into the river by grasping with his right hand a shrub, and thereby saving his life; and in the general surrender of all the forces on that field he was helped from his perilous position, and delivered as a prisoner of war to the enemy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

SILAS CHAMPION.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to provide a pension for Silas Champion, of Genesee county, in the State of New York, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to entitle him, as an invalid pensioner, to eight dollars per month, to commence from January 1, 1852.

Champion was a resident of the State of Vermont; and on the 7th of September, 1814, he volunteered for the defense of Plattsburg. He was in the battle of the Saranac on the 11th of that month as one of the advanced guard, and aided in driving the enemy back across the river Saranac. The night after the battle the force, of which he was a part, were compelled to lie upon the ground in the open air, without tent or blanket, with their muskets in their arms, to guard the ford of the river to prevent the enemy from again crossing, exposed through the whole night to a cold, drenching rain. Up to that time he had been a stout and healthy man, but upon the morning of the 12th September, 1814, after the battle and this night of exposure, he was found laboring under a violent attack of inflammatory rheumatism and fever, was carried home by his father, suffered much, and finally lost entirely the use of his right leg, and is totally disqualified from performing manual labor.

He applied to the Commissioner of Pensions for relief, but it was refused upon the ground that he had not been regularly mustered into the service of the United States, which fact it was necessary for him to show to bring his case within any existing law upon the subject.

The proof of the case shows, that the then Governor of Vermont, being opposed to the war; refused to call out the militia in defense of the country, and that the petitioner and his companions in arms were induced to volunteer from information received by a dispatch from General Macomb, then stationed at Plattsburg. This dispatch brought the intelligence, on the 7th September, 1814, that the enemy, with a force of about six times the number of the American army stationed there, were making a descent upon that place. Upon this emergency the petitioner and his companions in arms volunteered of their own accord, and at their own expense, and marched immediately to the scene of action, where they rendered efficient service to the country, though they were not formally and regularly mustered into the service of the United States; and for that service they have received no pay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. EDWARDS.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of William B. Edwards.

It proposes to require the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of W. B. Edwards on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st of January, 1854, and continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

MARY CARLTON.

The bill for the relief of Mary Carlton, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary Carlton on the list of revolutionary pensioners, at the rate of twenty-four dollars a year, to commence on the 1st of October, 1838, and to continue during her natural life.

Moses Carlton, the husband of the petitioner, was a soldier in the war of the Revolution. The precise day of his enlistment is not shown; but it is shown that he marched on the 25th day of June, 1780, from the town of Bradford, Massachusetts, and was discharged from service on the 10th day of December following, twelve days being allowed him, in addition, to return home. This period falls three days short of six months' service; but the committee think the presumption is very strong that he enlisted at least three days before he marched with his detachment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

COMMANDER G. I. PENDERGRAST.

The bill for the relief of Commander G. I. Pendergrast, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury to ascertain, allow, and pay to Pendergrast, the reasonable expenses, not exceeding $300, incurred by him for necessary medical attention during his command of the navy-yard at Memphis, and while no surgeon was on duty at that station.

The memorialist, commanding the navy-yard at Memphis, was on several occasions ill, and compelled to employ medical aid. There was no surgeon attached to or near the post, and both himself and his subordinate officer were constrained to seek the services of a private physician; and the expenses thus incurred amounted to about $300.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ISAAC COOK AND OTHERS.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Cook and others, was objected to by Mr. BAYARD, and passed over.

LIEUTENANT JOHN E. BISPHAM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of House bill for the relief of the executors of the late Lieutenant John E. Bispham.

It proposes to appropriate $913 69, to be paid Caleb J. Good, executor of John E. Bispham, late of the United States Navy, deceased, for expenses incurred by the deceased in a suit arising out of the seizure of the brig Malaga, off the coast of Africa, by the United States brig Boxer, while under the command of Lieutenant Bispham.

In April, 1846, Bispham, being the commanding officer of the United States brig Boxer, boarded and took possession of the brig Malaga, on the coast of Africa. The seizure was made under the belief that the Malaga was about to engage in the transportation of slaves from that coast, and was made in good faith, under circumstances calculated to produce a very strong suspicion against the vessel seized. The Malaga was sent to the district of Massachusetts, and was libeled on the 16th of June, 1846, but, on motion of the district attorney, the libel was discontinued. On the 17th of July, 1847, a suit was instituted by the owners of the Malaga against Bispham for the seizure, which, after full argument and trial, was dismissed with costs. The costs, as originally taxed by the clerk, included $500 for counsel fees. The libelants appealed from the taxation, and it was afterwards decided that "counsel fees should not be allowed as costs, there being no fund in court." In defending the suit, Lieutenant Bispham was compelled to employ counsel, and also to incur other necessary expenses, which it is thought it is the duty of Government to reimburse.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

THOMAS S. RUSSELL.

The bill for the relief of Thomas S. Russell, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers to audit the account of Thomas S. Russell, late an assistant commissary of subsistence in Colonel Brisbane's regiment of Florida volunteers, and pay whatever amount may be found due to him, notwithstanding the irregularity of his appointment, and although his name does not appear upon the rolls as one of the staff of Colonel Brisbane. The amount, however, is not to exceed the pay of an assistant commissary of subsistence from the 18th of February to the 10th of May, 1836.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

JOHN METCALF.

The bill for the relief of John Metcalf, reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time.

It proposes to appropriate to John Metcalf, $1,250, in full compensation for a quantity of goods belonging to him, which were lost or destroyed in consequence of the impressment into the service of the United States, by order of General Brown, of the schooner Tempest, at Buffalo, in the summer of 1814.

Mr. BAYARD objected to the consideration of the bill, and it was passed over.

BENJAMIN ROWE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair.) The next bill on the Calendar is the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Benjamin Rowe; which has been reported upon adversely by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate.

Mr. STUART. That being the case, I suppose the bill had better be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

JOHN HAMILTON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill upon the Calendar is one from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Hamilton; which has been reported from the Committee on Pensions adversely.

Mr. BAYARD. Ought not that report to be acted upon, unless some Senator dissents from it, and desires to discuss it? Should not the action of the Senate be had upon it now, if no one proposes to debate it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This being objection day, no other business is proper for the consideration of the Senate, but bills which are not objected to. This bill has been reported upon adversely, and a day has already been set apart for the consideration of adverse reports.

Mr. BAYARD. That applies, as I understand, to the case of adverse reports, where there is no bill—reports made upon petitions alone.

Mr. STUART. My understanding was that it was only to adverse reports upon petitions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made the bill will be passed over.

ALTON NELSON.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Alton Nelson, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Alton Nelson, of the county of Warren, and State of New York, on the roll of invalid pensioners, at eight dollars a month, from the 1st of January, 1853.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

SUSAN COODY AND OTHERS.

The bill for the relief of Susan Coody and others, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to pay $1,992 62 to Susan Coody and others, for property destroyed near Fort Gibson, by United States soldiers, on the 12th of March, 1845, in the proportion and sums respectively due them, according to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, of June 24, 1850.

Susan Coody and Richard Field were living on the military reserve, near Fort Madison, on the 12th of March, 1845, when their houses were burnt by armed bands of soldiers who were afterwards tried and convicted by the United States district court for Arkansas, for that crime. The destruction of the houses was accompanied also by the loss of their contents, which consisted of furniture, household clothing, and kitchen utensils, an enumeration of which, considered by the committee to be reasonable and fair, was taken before the agent of the United States for the Cherokees. The proof does not implicate either one of the persons asking remuneration, in the causes which led to the disturbance. On the contrary, it exempts Mrs. Coody from any such connection. The agent fully indorses the justice of the claim, and recommends the payment, except that of Richard Field in which happened the affair which led to a brutal attack on the women and children, some of whom were badly wounded.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs declined the payment only for want of an appropriation. The various amounts of losses specified in the report of the committee amount to $2,492 62, from which the loss and amount of damages alleged to have been sustained by the total abandonment of property ($500) is deducted, leaving $1,992 62, for which the bill is reported.

Mr. CHASE. Let that pass over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill must go over.

SYLVESTER PETTIBONE.

The bill for the relief of Sylvester Pettibone was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct that Sylvester Pettibone, of Wisconsin, and his real and personal property, shall be released and relieved from a judgment in favor of the United States, obtained against him in the district court of the United States for Wisconsin, and from all liens and encumbrances created by the judgment; with a provision, however, that the cost of the suit in which the judgment was rendered shall first be paid by him, together with the further sum of $500 for the benefit of the United States.

Mr. STUART. I see that that bill has never undergone the investigation of a committee. It proposes to release property from the effect of a judgment. I move its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Subsequently Mr. WALKER said: I did not notice the motion made by the Senator from Michigan to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. If he will give his attention to me for a moment, I think he will withdraw the motion.

Mr. STUART. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BADGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Wisconsin can make his statement now.

Mr. WALKER. It is the case, in regard to which I made a short statement the other day. Mr. Pettibone is a very old man; he became security for his nephew, who was arrested for passing a counterfeit quarter eagle gold piece. The bail required of him was very large; the nephew disappeared somewhat mysteriously, and Mr. Pettibone has never been able to produce him. Suit was brought against him in the district court of the United States, and a judgment of $3,000 was rendered against him. The last particle of property that he had on earth has been sold for it; the equity of redemption has expired; and now it is proposed to relieve him upon the payment of $500 or $1,000. All the injury which the Government sustained was the passing of one counterfeit quarter eagle. I would be very glad if I had the papers here, to produce them to the Senate, but they are all in the House of Representatives. When the bill goes there they will have possession of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I now withdraw the motion to refer.

Mr. BAYARD. I object to the bill, as it has not been referred to a committee. I think its principle needs examination.

JAMES EDWARDS AND OTHERS.

The bill for the relief of James Edwards and others, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was read a second time, and considered, as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to ascertain, by the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit of, the value of the houses and other property of James Edwards, of the late Edward M. Wanton, and of Nehemiah Brush, destroyed at Micanopy, Florida, in the year 1836, by order of Lieutenant Colonel B. K. Pierce, the commanding officer of that post, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy, and that the amount so ascertained be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, but with the provision that the amounts so to be paid shall not exceed $2,482 32 in the case of Edwards; $1,812 50 in the case of Wanton, or $800 in the case of Brush.

It appears, by an official copy of reports from Lieutenant Colonel B. K. Pierce, of the United States Army, to his commanding officer, Colonel J. B. Crane, and from Colonel Crane to the War Department, that Micanopy, in Florida, was abandoned on the 24th of August, 1836, in consequence of the inability of the force there to maintain itself against the enemy; and in pursuance of orders to that effect, Colonel Pierce states, that all the articles, both private and public, which he was compelled to leave for want of transportation, he ordered to be destroyed, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy.

A part of the property thus destroyed has been paid for by direction of acts of Congress for the relief of Charles Waldon, passed March 3, 1843, and of George Center, passed March 3, 1849. It is in evidence, and satisfactorily proved, by the affidavits of John H. McIntosh, Benjamin Harris, Isaac Lanier, and Charles Waldron, that Edwards sustained heavy losses by the destruction of his property, consisting of houses, furniture, merchandise, &c., at Micanopy, on the 24th August, 1836, by order of the officer in command, to prevent the same from falling into the hands of the enemy. The amount of his damages is estimated at $2,482 32. Benjamin Harn, Isaac Lanier, John Dick, and Jesse A. Brush, all testifying, under oath, that the houses, merchandise, tools, &c., &c., of Wanton, were also destroyed, at the same time and place, by the same order, and for the same purpose. And his loss is estimated at $1,812 50.

James Edwards's testimony, sustaining the claim of the late John M. Brush, is, that the said Nehemiah Brush owned a house at Micanopy at the time of its abandonment; that this house was worth $800; that it was destroyed by order of Colonel B. K. Pierce on the 24th of August, 1836. The witness was a house carpenter, and competent to judge of the value of the house, and his evidence is given in due form of law. He further testifies that this house, though it belonged to Nehemiah Brush, was in the occupancy—rented to—George Center, who has been paid for the goods, &c., destroyed in the house.

In the cases of Edwards and Wanton the witnesses testify that, by permission of the officers, their goods, furniture, &c., were removed from their houses to the fort for greater safety, and when the fort was destroyed, everything it contained was burnt with it.

The principle is fully established by the legislation of Congress, that private property, destroyed by a commanding officer of the United States Army in a period of war, should be paid for. The destruction being for the common good of the community, the loss should be borne in common.

Mr. EVANS. That will lead to some discussion. I am not satisfied with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JAMES WORMSLEY.

The bill for the relief of James Wormsley, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of James Wormsley on the roll of revolutionary pensioners, and pay him the sum of $96 per annum from the 4th of July, 1848, and during his natural life.

He enlisted into the service of the United States as a private soldier, in the State of Rhode Island, in June, 1780, for six months, under Lieutenant Johnson, who was attached to the regiment commanded by Colonel Christopher Green, and served the full term of six months, when he was discharged, and he claims a pension under the act of 7th June, 1832. Several witnesses have testified that they were well acquainted with the petitioner when he enlisted, and that they believe he served in the regiment six months, as stated by him. It appears, however, from the records on file in the Pension Office, that, although he was paid for six months' service, he was discharged before the expiration of six months; that the six months' levies of 1780, in which he served, commenced 10th July, and were discharged on the last Monday of November, 1780.

The act of 7th June, 1832, provides for those only who served and received pay for six months. The petitioner having served only about five months, is not legally entitled to a pension. But having been willing to serve out the term for which he enlisted, and being now upwards of eighty-eight years of age, and destitute of the means of support, the committee think that he is entitled to the favorable consideration of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

E. J. M'LANE.

The bill for the relief of E. J. McLane, reported from the Committee on Commerce, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to E. J. McLane or his legal representative, $1,692 45, being compensation for his services and expenses as inspector of the customs in the collection district of Brazos de St. Jago, in the State of Texas, while seizing and detaining horses and mules smuggled into the United States from Mexico, with a provision, however, that he shall produce, before the accounting officers, satisfactory vouchers for the same, or to allow and pay such part as shall be so vouched.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HARRIS.

The bill for the relief of William Harris, of Georgia, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the claim of William Harris, and pay him for his services in the United States Army in the same manner as if he had not deserted therefrom; but with the provision that the same shall not exceed the pay and emoluments of a sergeant of infantry, from the 18th of April, 1814, to the 25th of November, 1816.

Mr. CHASE objected to the bill, and it was passed over.

VASQUEZ AND COLLIGAN.

The bill authorizing the legal representatives of Antoine Vasquez, Hypolite Vasquez, Joseph Vasquez, and John Colligan to enter certain lands in Missouri, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the parties named to enter, without payment, at any land office in Missouri, in such quantities, agreeably to the United States surveys, as the claimants may desire, a quantity of land subject to private entry, not exceeding eight hundred arpens for each of the three persons first named, and twelve hundred arpens for Colligan, in lieu of, and in compensation for, a claim of that quantity allowed to them by the board of commissioners appointed for the final adjustment of private land claims in the State of Missouri, and confirmed to them by "An act confirming claims to land in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1836, and to direct the register or registers of the land offices to receive the proper applications and proofs, and issue the necessary certificate or certificates, on return of which to the General Land Office, with proofs sufficient in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior to establish the right of the claimants as such legal representatives, a patent or patents shall issue as in other cases.

The sons of Don Benito Vasquez, viz: Benito, Antoine, Hypolite, Joseph, and Pierre Vasquez, claimed eight hundred arpens each of land in Missouri, by virtue of a Spanish concession, alleged to have been made in 1800. In 1806 they presented their papers and proof to substantiate their claim before the commissioners appointed to investigate such claims, and in 1833 it was allowed by the board appointed under the act of the 9th July, 1832. The board declare themselves unanimously of opinion that this claim ought to be confirmed to the claimants, or their legal representatives, according to the concession. By the act of July 4, 1836, this, with other decisions in favor of claimants in the report, were confirmed by Congress.

Two sons of Vasquez, Benito and Pierre, or their legal representatives, had located their lands before the board acted on the subject. The title to the premises located by Benito, under the concession, became the subject of adjudication in the case of Bissell vs. Penrose, in which the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the title under the grant. The two sons last named, having received their titles under the concession, have no further claim on the Government.

The lands conceded to Antoine, Hypolite, and Joseph Vasquez, were not surveyed or located when approved by the commissioners, and subsequently confirmed by the act of Congress of July 4, 1836. This act excludes from its operation most of the cases reported upon by the commissioners, in which the locations had not actually been made; but this claim, either by oversight, or because it had in part been located, was, with one or two others of a similar character, confirmed by the act.

In the cases of these confirmed claims, where no actual location of the premises had been made, a difficulty was found by the Department in granting the land confirmed by the act to the claimant. The opinion of the Attorney General, Hon. H. D. Gilpin, was procured on the subject, in which, after examining the various provisions of the act, he says: "I am of opinion that the first section of the act in question fully confirms and gives a valid title under the grant to the sons of Benito Vasquez; but I do not think that without further legislation the same can be located upon any of the public lands of the United States. This can never be done, except by authority from the Legislature; and the law in question, though it confirms the grant, does not provide for its location." He further adds, that "all the claims confirmed by the first section, except a very few, were located Spanish grants; for them the second and third sections of the act adequately provide; for the others no provision is made, doubtless from accident; but the omission is one that can only be supplied by legislation."

The claim of Colligan for twelve hundred arpens of land was allowed by the same Board of Commissioners on the 12th November, 1833, and was confirmed by the same act of Congress, of July 4, 1836. This case presents the same difficulty as that above mentioned, arising from the want of survey and location before confirmation.

As Congress has already decided on the merits of these claims, and has made the grant in question, further legislation authorizing the perfecting of the same by location on public lands ought to be had. In no other way can they obtain the benefit of a claim decided in their favor by the commissioners, and expressly confirmed by act of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. SLACUM.

The bill for the relief of the personal representative of William A. Slacum, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill is designed to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the account of the late William A. Slacum, and to pay his personal representative, in addition to what Mr. Slacum received in his lifetime, his charges for expenses incurred in visiting the Columbia river, in pursuance of the directions of the Secretary of State, in the years 1836 and 1837; but the amount allowed in such expenses is not to exceed $712 90. It is also proposed to pay to his said representative, as compensation for the services rendered to the United States by Mr. Slacum on that mission, at the rate of six dollars per diem, commencing from the 1st of June, 1836, and continuing to the 15th of March, 1837; but the amount of pay received by Mr. Slacum as a purser in the Navy of the United States, during the period of time embraced in the above dates, is to be deducted from the amount of that per diem allowance.

The late William A. Slacum was commissioned by President Van Buren, through his Secretary of State, Mr. Forsyth, by his letter dated 11th of November, 1835, to obtain some specific and authentic information in regard to the inhabitants of the country in the neighborhood of the Oregon or Columbia river, and generally all such information in that region, political, physical, statistical, and geographical, as might prove useful or interesting to this Government.

In pursuance of this commission, Mr. Slacum did, in the year 1836, proceed to the Oregon Territory, and there fulfilled his instructions, and, in the year 1837, reported the results of his labors in his narrative, addressed to Secretary Forsyth.

The claim for repayment of expenses incurred and paid for the use and benefit of the Government is founded upon the following facts:

That not being able to procure a vessel to convey him from the west coast of Mexico, where he commenced to perform his mission up the coast to the Columbia river, on the 1st of June, 1836, Mr. Slacum provided himself with mules, provisions, and servants, to perform the land journey to Oregon; but owing to the difficulties and dangers of the route at that season of the year, (especially the scarcity of water,) he was obliged to abandon it, and proceed by sea, via the Sandwich Islands. The expenses attending these preparations, loss on resale of mules, &c., and pay of servants, amounting to the sum of $135, make the first item of his claim, which the committee think is reasonable, and ought to be allowed.

The second and third items are for freight and insurance paid by Mr. Slacum on $3,000 in specie, of his own funds, conveyed with him to pay his expenses, and all of which was devoted to the use of the United States; and for interest on $3,231 of his own funds, paid by him in expenses incurred solely for the use of the Government, as admitted in the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury Department. The interest claimed is on this amount from the time he so applied it till it was repaid to him at the settlement of his accounts, upon his return to this city. These items together amount to the sum of $380, which the committee think ought to be allowed.

The item claimed for expenses of servant from Mexico to this city, the committee think ought not to be allowed, because they believe Mr. Slacum could have dispensed with his services.

The item claiming the amount distributed in presents to Indians and others, for facilities in aid of his duties, the committee think is reasonable, and ought to be allowed; it amounts to $198.

The memorialist also prays such compensation for his services as Congress may deem them to merit. Although no remuneration for services was promised to Mr. Slacum by the President, yet it is reasonable and just that some compensation should be allowed on this account. Mr. Slacum appears to have performed his mission with dispatch and fidelity. It was a duty attended with much privation, exposure, and peril; it was performed during the most inclement season; and it was fruitful of much valuable information to this Government, and of great benefit to our citizens inhabiting that Territory.

Mr. BAYARD objected to the consideration of the bill; and it was passed over.

PRACTICAL ANÆSTHESIA.

Mr. EVERETT. The bill to recompense the discoverer of practical anæsthesia has been passed over by the Chair. Is it not a private bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a bill which will undoubtedly lead to discussion. The Chair will, however, announce it to the Senate.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let it pass over.

ALEXANDER LEA.

The bill for the relief of Alexander Lea, reported from the Committee on Commerce, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Alexander Lea the sum of $1,500, being for losses sustained by him in the destruction of the light-house on Chandeleur Island, in August, 1852, as light-keeper, if it shall be made to appear, to the satisfaction of the accounting officers, that he sustained losses to that amount; or to pay such part as may be made so to appear.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

GIDEON HOTCHKISS.

The bill for the relief of Gideon Hotchkiss, reported from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill revives the letters patent granted to Gideon Hotchkiss, a citizen of the United States, on the 9th of January, 1837, for "a new and useful improvement in the construction of reacting water-wheels and their appendages," for the term of fourteen years from the 30th of November, 1836, and extends it for and during the term of seven years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

FRANCISCO LOPE URRIZA.

The bill for the relief of Francisco Lopez Urriza, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By this bill the Secretary of the Treasury will be directed to pay to Francisco Lopez Urriza, $10,250 as full compensation for the value of the schooner Julia, improperly seized while lying at La Paz on the 18th of September, 1846, by Commander S. F. Dupont of the United States Navy.

Mr. STUART objected to the bill; and it was passed over.

DUSUAN DE LA CROIX.

The bill to confirm the claim of Dusuan de la Croix to a tract of land therein mentioned, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

In the supplemental report of the register and receiver at Jackson court-house, dated December 29, 1820, communicated to the Senate February 23, 1821, it is stated that claim number four, in said report, was, "inadvertently omitted in the general report," made on the 11th of July, 1820, and presented to the Senate the 17th of November, same year; and it is considered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that by reason of that omission, the claim is not entitled to the confirmation contained in the act of May 8, 1822, confirming the general report of 1820. But by this bill it is proposed to confirm the claim to Dusuan de la Croix, his legal representatives and assigns, according to the Spanish survey referred to in the claim, as fully as if the claim had been confirmed by the act of 1822; but this grant and confirmation are only to amount to a relinquishment, on the part of the United States, of all its right and title to the lot of land thus granted and confirmed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

JEMISON AND WILLIAMSON.

The bill for the relief of Robert Jemison and Benjamin Williamson, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By this bill the Postmaster General will be authorized to cause to be paid to Robert Jemison and Benjamin Williamson the same amount of remuneration for carrying the United States mail during twenty-six weeks, in the year 1836, on route 2,696, from Selma to Elyton, Alabama, as the original contractors for that route would have been entitled to receive under the terms of their contract.

The claimants were mail contractors, in 1836, to carry the United States mail on route 2656, from Montgomery, via Selma, to Tuscaloosa, and in consequence of disturbances with the Creek Indians were required to carry mails not belonging to their contract. Owing to failure of the contractors on route 2696, from Selma to Elyton, they were also obliged to carry the mail over said route, for which they never had contracted. At the second session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, a law was passed authorizing the Postmaster General to cause to be paid to them, as they supposed at the time, the value of all of the extra service thus performed; but that officer, in acting under that law, felt himself constrained, by its terms, to restrict the allowance to the extra services imposed by the Creek disturbances only. The claimants now ask Congress to pass a law allowing them, in addition to the compensation already granted, the remuneration to which the original contractors from Selma to Elyton would have been entitled, during the same time, had they continued to comply with their contract.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. One of the gentlemen named in that bill, Mr. Williamson, is dead; and I therefore move to amend it by inserting before "Benjamin Williamson" the words "the legal representatives of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed, and its title amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Robert Jemison, and the legal representatives of Benjamin Williamson."

ALMANZON HUSTON.

The bill for the relief of Almanzon Huston, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Postmaster General to examine the claims of Almanzon Huston for additional compensation for carrying the mail from Sabintown to the city of Houston, and from Huntsville to Washington, in the State of Texas, and to make such allowance as he may deem just and equitable.

Huston, in October, 1848, became the sub-contractor, under R. W. Martin, to carry the mail from Sabintown to San Augustine, in the State of Texas, in two-horse post coaches, (a distance of twenty-eight miles,) at an annual compensation of $575. About the same time he became a sub-contractor, under G. W. Grant, to carry the mails from San Augustine to the city of Houston, a distance of upwards of two hundred miles, in two-horse coaches, and a horse mail from Huntsville to Washington, about seventy-five miles, for the annual compensation of $5,100. Soon afterwards the service from Huntsville to Washington was increased to two-horse coach service, and an additional allowance was made to him by the Postmaster General of $750; an increase of speed was also ordered, from seven to five days, on the lines, for which an additional allowance of $500 was made. It appears that the mails increased so much in weight that he was compelled, in November, 1848, to place four-horse coaches upon the lines. It is also shown that, during the past winter, the roads have been unusually bad, and, in consequence of high waters, the expenses for ferriages have been much increased.

The whole allowance to Huston, including the additional compensation, was $6,925. The contracts which have just been made for carrying the mails upon the same routes amount, in the aggregate, to $16,290. The memorialist, under these circumstances, prays that an additional allowance may be made to him by Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

THE GENERAL ARMSTRONG CASE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar is one for the relief of the claimants of the private armed brig General Armstrong.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that bill had better be laid aside.

Mr. SLIDELL. Has the Senator read the report in the case?

Mr. SUMNER. I have not.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope the Senator will allow the report to be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. SLIDELL. It is not necessary to read the whole of the report, but only the last two or three pages, which contain a recapitulation of the testimony and facts of the case.

The Secretary proceeded to read the part of the report indicated; but, before concluding—

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that we are taking up time unnecessarily. I think a bill of this importance ought not to be passed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, by Mr. McKean, Chief Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth.

The President then signed the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Webster, his Private Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws.

Also, an act for the benefit of the citizens and occupants of the town of Council Bluffs, in Iowa.

MARK AND RICHARD H. BEAN.

The bill for the relief of Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean, of Arkansas, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mark and Richard H. Bean $15,000, as compensation and indemnity, in full, for losses sustained by them in their removal, under the third article of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, of May 6, 1828, by which they were forced to abandon, not only the lands which they had settled, cultivated, and improved, but an extensive manufactory of salt, warehouses, dwelling houses, and other large improvements, of which, and the prospective advantages therefrom, they were thus deprived by the act of the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

THOMAS FRASER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar is House bill for the relief of Thomas Fraser, which was referred to the Senate Committee on Pensions, and the committee asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator as objecting to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SLIDELL. I understand that the committee report adversely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. SLIDELL. I understand it to be an adverse report; if so, let the bill go over.

Mr. HAMLIN subsequently said: I desire to ask the Senate to consider the bill for the relief of Thomas Fraser, which passed the House, and from which the committee of the Senate ask to be discharged without reporting favorably or unfavorably. I will read the report of the House committee:

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Fraser, a soldier in the war of 1812, ask leave to report: That Fraser, in consequence of an injury received at St. Albans, Vermont, while sergeant in Captain Danforth's company, Colonel McCobb's regiment, in the summer of 1813, was, by act of Congress, placed on the pension roll to draw $2 66 per month for partial disability. He has now become entirely disabled in consequence of that injury, and produces evidence of total disability. Your committee recommend that his pension should be increased to eight dollars per month from April 1, 1853, and ask leave to introduce the accompanying bill."

It seems to me that there is only one side to the case. I have here the certificate of two surgeons. I know them personally; they are eminent in their profession. They certify that this man is now totally disabled. I ask, therefore, that the bill may be taken up.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to hear the statement of the committee why they asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. We ought certainly to have their reasons.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it was because they reported a general bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to hear the reason from some member of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. The Senator from Maine has stated the reason. The committee have agreed to report a general bill providing for this and some twelve or twenty other cases of a similar character which were referred to them.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I object to the consideration of this bill. I think that quite a sufficient reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator objects, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. BAYARD. I object.

PIERCE AND HODGE.

The bill for the relief of Levi Pierce and Andrew Hodge, jr., reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By this bill the Postmaster General will be authorized to settle with and discharge Levi Pierce and Andrew Hodge, jr., sureties on the official bond of William H. Ker, formerly postmaster at New Orleans, on their paying, or securing to pay, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General, within one year, $12,500; and either of them may thus be discharged on his paying, or securing to pay, one half of that sum; but the Postmaster General, and the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana, are to be satisfied that it is for the interest of the United States that such settlement should be made. Such settlement with and discharge of one surety is not to be construed to discharge the other.

In 1839 the Postmaster General, Mr. Kendall, dispatched a specific agent, Mr. Marron, to New Orleans, to look into the accounts of Mr. Ker, and to take measures, as it appears, to secure the funds of the Department. Mr. Marron reports, under date of August 15, 1839, that, in looking into the accounts of Mr. Ker, he found them worse than he anticipated, the indebtedness to the Department being $62,000. Mr. Marron proceeded to secure the Department, as far as practicable, by taking mortgages on Mr. Ker's property; this, he says, was all he could get, and subject, of course, to previous encumbrances. He informs the Postmaster General, in this report, that he made his movements as still as possible, for fear Mr. Ker's sureties would push for a conveyance of the property to them.

It appears from a letter of the Postmaster General that there was received from these mortgages the sum of $5,992 55, and that that is all that has been realized from any source.

In April, 1841, suit was brought on his official bond to recover the amount of the penalty, $25,000, and interest. The defendants admitted their signatures, but denied the indebtedness of Ker, and alleged that if Ker was indebted, then they could not be held responsible, because in August, 1839, the plaintiffs, without the knowledge or consent of the defendants, received from Ker an act of mortgage upon property to secure them against loss; and that in consideration of this mortgage security they granted Ker an extension of six months.

In April, 1843, the case was tried in the United States circuit court at New Orleans, and a verdict rendered for defendants. It was taken to the Supreme Court by writ of error, and in December, 1844, dismissed, the defendants not having been properly cited. It came up again in the Supreme Court on a transcript of the record, and in 1847 the judgment of the circuit court was reversed.

The case came up again in the circuit court in 1851, but the jury could not agree. In May, 1851, it was again tried in the same court, and the evidence offered by the Government being ruled out, a verdict was given for defendants. A writ of error was again taken to the Supreme Court, and the judgment of the court below was again reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial, and now stands on the docket of the circuit court for a fourth trial.

The memorialist asks that Congress will pass an act for his relief, upon such terms as will, while it protects the Government from total loss, save him from utter prostration. He states that his circumstances have become greatly embarrassed; that he has been and is compromising with his private creditors, and he asks from the Government the same amount of grace he has received from them, as the only means of saving himself from pecuniary ruin.

In view of the embarrassing state of the pending suit, the uncertainty of recovering anything, and of all the circumstances of the case, the committee are of opinion that the Postmaster General and the district attorney should be authorized to make such a compromise as they may deem just and equitable, and conducive to the interests of the Government, within the limits and according to the terms prescribed in the bill submitted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ANDREW J. DICKERHOFF.

The bill for the relief of Andrew J. Dickierhoff reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By this bill the Secretary of the Interior will be directed to place the name of Andrew J. Dickierhoff on the roll of invalid pensioners, and pay to him annually a pension of ninety-six dollars, to commence on the 1st of January, 1850, and continue during his life.

The petitioner enlisted in Ohio "for during the war" with Mexico, was assigned at Newport barracks to company G, fourth infantry, (the regiment then being at Puebla, Mexico, where he afterwards joined it,) and was, at subsequent periods, successively transferred to I and K companies of said regiment, as the first named two companies were each, in turn, broken up, and was honorably discharged from company K at the close of the war, at Pascagoula. At the time of his enlistment, petitioner was not eighteen years old, and of rather delicate frame, and was severely attacked, while in the service, by fever and ague, mumps, and colds; but was, nevertheless, never placed on the sick list, from personal reluctance and aversion to hospital treatment. At the time of his discharge at Pascagoula he was in a very feeble condition of health, owing to the hardships, exposures, and constant colds; but never having reported himself sick, no mention of disability was made in his discharge. His debility and sickness greatly increased on his journey home to Mount Vernon, Ohio, from Pascagoula, as certified by Surgeon McGugin, of the fifteenth regiment United States Army, in Mexico, who accompanied him a part of the journey. After reaching home in his feeble and jaded condition, Surgeon McGugin examined him, and found that he had contracted a disease of the spine, of so serious a nature as to result in curvature, contraction, and partial paralysis of the left side, shortening the left leg, and implicating the muscles to such an extent that involuntary and most distressing contortions of the face and other parts of the body became frequent. Surgeon McGugin certifies, under oath, that petitioner was at that time, and is now, in such a condition of bodily health as to render manual labor impossible, and mental exertion dangerous to reason and life. He further states, on his oath, that, from his personal knowledge of the case, he is satisfied that the accumulated sufferings and unhappy disabilities of the petitioner resulted from his hardships and exposures in the Army of the United States in the war with Mexico. Dr. Selman, of Bloomfield, Iowa, confirms the statement of petitioner's present condition, and concurs in the opinion as to its cause.

It is further proved by the testimony of Dr. McGugin, that petitioner's mind has been materially impaired by his peculiar diseases, and he now fails to recollect many names and circumstances that would be of service in procuring the proofs required under the regulations of the Pension Bureau. He does not know where to find a comrade who served with him, and who would have had a personal knowledge of his sufferings in Mexico; and as he refused to report himself sick, of course none of the officers could, in their official capacity, certify to any disability resulting from diseases incurred in the service. Hence the petitioner, after a rejection of his claim by the Commissioner of Pensions, on account of the absence of the kind of proofs required by the rules of that office, had no alternative but to apply to Congress for a special act for his relief. The committee are of opinion that the case is sufficiently made out to justify legislation in behalf of petitioner. He appears to be a most unfortunate, and, from the testimony accompanying, worthy and meritorious individual. It is made satisfactorily to appear that his health was good before his enlistment, that he was a temperate and prudent man, that he returned home sick, and that his sickness has resulted in deplorable disability; and though the testimony is not such as meets the requirements of the bureau, it is such, in the opinion of your committee, as to call for the charity of the Government.

The high professional and private character of Surgeon McGugin and Dr. Selman is satisfactorily sustained by the letter of Hon. A. C. Dodge, Senator, and Hon. B. HENN, member of Congress, from Iowa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ANN W. ANGUS.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Ann W. Angus, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By this bill the Secretary of the Interior will be directed to continue to Ann W. Angus, for a further term of five years, from the 4th of March, 1854, the pension heretofore paid her, which expired on that day, and to extend to her the benefits of all laws which may hereafter be passed, making general provisions for widows, or further continuing their half pay, to which benefits she would have been entitled if her husband, Samuel Angus, had died in the service of the United States. But the amount is not to exceed half the pay of her husband in any one year.

The petitioner is the widow of a captain in the United States Navy. She was pensioned in 1849, by a special act of Congress, for a term of five years, which expired on the 4th of March last, and under the peculiar circumstances attending the case, she is unable to fill the blanks sent from the Pension Bureau, in such a way as to entitle her to a continuance of her half pay under the existing statutes; and as she is aged and indigent, she now prays an act of Congress to continue her expired pension for a further term of five years, or for life, if consistent with the principles of the general statutes relating to pensions.

Captain Angus entered the service at the age of fifteen, in the year 1799, and remained in the service until the latter part of Mr. Monroe's Administration, when he was dismissed, without a trial by court-martial, for writing a letter to the Secretary of the Navy which was not considered respectful. At the time of writing the letter, he was laboring under temporary insanity, of which President Monroe afterwards became satisfied, and recommended his successor, Mr. Adams, to reinstate him. He was not, however, reinstated, in consequence of his being subject to fits of insanity, but was allowed a pension, which continued to his death, on the 29th May, 1840.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

HEZEKIAH MILLER.

The bill for the relief of Hezekiah Miller, reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct that $1,358 44 be paid to Hezekiah Miller, that sum being an unpaid balance of his salary as a clerk in the War Department from the 1st of January, 1829, to the 31st of December, 1832; but this payment is to be in full for all claims of Miller against the United States, arising out of arrears of compensation or salary.

Hezekiah Miller was a clerk in the Indian Bureau at a salary of $1,000 per annum, but performed the duties of a $1,400 clerk, and on the 1st of January, 1849, General P. B. Porter, then Secretary of War, decided, in accordance with the request of Mr. McKenny, head of the Bureau, that his salary should be $1,400. Notwithstanding this informal decision, however, the salary continued to be paid at the rate of $1,000 until 1830, when, on his application, it was increased to $1,150; the next year (1831) it was reduced to $1,091 50; and in 1832 to $1,000. In 1833 it was finally fixed at $1,400. His claim now is, that he was entitled to $1,400 a year from the 1st of January, 1829, as designed by General Porter, and that the sum of $1,358 44 has been unjustly withheld, for which he should be paid principal and interest from January 1, 1833. In 1840 he was promoted to a salary of $1,600, which he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ABRAHAM DARDENNE.

The bill for the relief of Theresa Dardenne, widow of Abraham Dardenne, and their children, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow Theresa Dardenne, widow of Abraham Dardenne, to enter in legal subdivisions, at any land office in Arkansas, free of cost, six hundred and forty acres of any unappropriated land belonging to the United States, for the use and benefit equally of herself and her children by Abraham Dardenne, as an indemnification for losses sustained by them on account of an erroneous sale of land made to him by the land officers at Little Rock, Arkansas, on the 20th of January, 1836, as per certificates of purchase, Nos. 1132 and 1133. The acceptance of the six hundred and forty acres of land, free of cost, by Theresa Dardenne, is to be held to be a full release to the United States of all claim on her part, and of the other heirs of Abraham Dardenne, deceased, growing out of the before-recited erroneous entry of lands.

It appears on record in the General Land Office, that Abraham Dardenne entered at the land office at Little Rock, Arkansas, January 30, 1836, the north part of the northwest fractional quarter (east of Arkansas river) of section six, in township five south, of range nine west, containing forty-three and fourteen hundredth acres; also, the northeast fractional quarter of same section, containing one hundred and fifty-nine and forty-five one hundredth acres; that some time subsequent to the date of said entries, it was discovered that the same were illegal, for the reason that the tracts of land were covered by donation certificate No. 107, dated May 19, 1830, (claim No. 145,) in the name of the heir of Aaron Hanscom, and a patent issued thereon, and that on the 6th of October, 1847, notice of the fact that the aforesaid entries were illegal was forwarded to Abraham Dardenne, by the land officers at Little Rock, Arkansas, being nearly eleven years subsequent to the entry by Dardenne. It further appears of record that the purchase money ($253 23½) still remains in the Treasury of the United States.

The affidavit of the petitioner, widow of the late Abraham Dardenne, sets forth that herself, husband, and children labored hard to improve and reduce to a state of cultivation the afore-mentioned lands, for the term of eleven years, believing they were the sole owners, and that repeatedly, during that term of years, her husband was offered $5,000 for the premises, but refused the same, preferring his home to money. It is further in evidence that the petitioner, with her five children, (who were dependent upon her for support,) were ejected, by force of law, from the premises on the first day of January, 1851, and that herself and children are homeless and in a state of destitution. Her present unhappy situation has been brought about solely by the errors of the United States land officers.

Thus it appears that Abraham Dardenne, deceased, bought from and paid the United States for land to which the United States had no title, having already sold it; that the United States still holds the money, over $250, and has held it over eighteen years; that for eleven years Dardenne was suffered to hold and improve the land without notice that he had no title; that he continued to reside on the land, refusing to give it up until his death, and his family after him till 1st of January, 1851, when the widow and her children, resisting in the courts, were ejected by force of law; that they are poor, and the children dependent on the mother; that they have not only lost the use of their money, but the interest for over eighteen years, and not only lost the land, but all the improvements, which, with their own labor and humble means, they had expended on it for eighteen years of continuous occupation, which had greatly enhanced its value; that to refund, now, the original sum would be scandalous; that to refund it with interest would be palpable injustice, in the loss of all their labor and improvements, and the increased value of the land; that all lands of similar value, on the banks of the Arkansas river, are now entered and out of reach of the petitioner; that authority to enter in full satisfaction, six hundred and forty acres of land, such as is now subject to private entry, at the minimum price of the public lands, seems the nearest approach to justice which can be attained.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

HENRY LA REINTRIE.

The bill for the relief of Henry La Reintrie, reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Henry La Reintrie $593, in full satisfaction and discharge of his claim for services rendered to the United States legation near the Government of Chili, and as bearer of dispatches from that legation to Washington.

Mr. La Reintrie was secretary to Commodore Shubrick, of the Navy, and while attached in that capacity to the United States ship Independence, at Valparaiso, upon the urgent request of Mr. Barton, chargé d'affaires at Chili, was ordered by the commodore to repair to the city of Santiago and place himself under the direction of Mr. Barton. He promptly obeyed the order, although the service had no legal or proper relation to his duty as commodore's secretary. He continued to serve, faithfully and laboriously, as secretary of legation at Santiago, from the 6th of January to the 30th of April, 1849, and for twenty-eight days afterwards, as bearer of dispatches to the Government of the United States, at the request of Mr. Barton. For this service he claims compensation at the rate of six dollars per day, amounting to $858. He asserts that he was employed from twelve to sixteen hours daily, in recording, translating, and interpreting, or copying, during his service as secretary of legation. This arduous public service, as well as the exigency which required it, are amply verified by satisfactory proof.

The memorialist presents a further claim for extra services rendered under the following circumstances, viz: while holding the appointment of secretary to Commodore Shubrick, he was transferred to the service of Commodore Jones, commanding officer of the Pacific squadron, on board the United States ship Independence, where he was employed from the 7th of May to the 15th of July, 1848, in interpreting or translating the Spanish language, in the course of the official correspondence of the last-mentioned officer. For this extra service he claims $100 per month in addition to his regular salary, amounting to $226. This claim was disallowed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives of the first session, Thirty-First Congress, No. 122, on the ground that "as secretary, it appertained to the duties of the petitioner to perform the labor of conducting the correspondence of his superior, either in the particulars of transcribing letters in the same, or in a different language, or in other appropriate service," and that in this case, "his superior only, and not his fiduciary relation and service, was changed." The claim for this service is therefore disallowed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

AMOS AND J. E. KENDALL.

The bill for the relief of Amos and John E. Kendall was announced as the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. EVANS objected to its consideration, and it was passed over.

WILLIAM MILLER.

The bill for the relief of William Miller, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William Miller, of Livingston, county of York, and State of Maine, on the roll of invalid pensioners, and pay to him a pension of ninety-six dollars per annum, to commence on the tenth of February, 1845, and continue during his natural life.

William Miller enlisted in April, 1814, as a private in the twenty-first regiment of infantry, and, in July following, crossed with the regiment from Black Rock into Canada. He assisted at the capture of Fort Erie, and afterwards at the battles of Chippewa, Queenstown Heights, and Bridgewater; but, having contracted a disease in the head, producing frequent fits of epilepsy, to which he had never before been subject, he was left, at the close of that brilliant campaign, in the hospital at Williamsville, in a state of disability, from which he has never recovered. It is proved, by the depositions of witnesses, who have known him from his boyhood, that he entered the army with a robust constitution, and in vigorous health. His attending physician in the hospital, Dr. James Bates, then an assistant surgeon in the army, and since a Representative in Congress from the State of Maine, expresses his belief that the disability was occasioned by exposure during the campaign, which he states to have been one of the severest in that section of the army that was experienced during the war, and that many hundreds thereby irrecoverably lost their health. The epileptic fits, which first occurred at the hospital at Williamsville, are found to have periodically returned, accompanied with vertigo, and other symptoms of continued disease in the head, by which Mr. Miller has become totally disabled from supporting himself by manual labor. Other respectable physicians concur in the opinion expressed by the hospital surgeon, that this disability is owing to the disease contracted by exposure while in the army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

LEMUEL HUDSON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, considered the House bill for the relief of Lemuel Hudson.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to cause the name of Lemuel Hudson, formerly surgeon of the twelfth regiment, fourth brigade, New York militia, in the war of 1812, to be entered on the pension rolls, and pay to him the sum of twenty-two dollars per month, during his natural life, commencing January 1, 1852.

Lemuel Hudson was a surgeon in the twelfth regiment, fourth brigade, New York militia, commanded by Colonel John T. Van Dolfen, which was ordered by Governor Tompkins to march from Albany county, New York, to Sackett's Harbor, in the summer of 1812. The regiment marched from Albany county on or about the 15th of August, 1812, and was accompanied by Hudson, then a stout and healthy man, as surgeon. When at the town of Champion, Jefferson county, thirty miles from Sackett's Harbor, the regiment was overtaken by a heavy storm of snow and sleet, which continued for a long time, and left three or four inches of snow on the ground, which lay for several days. The soldiers were unprovided with suitable clothes to withstand the inclemency of the weather, and much hardship and sickness ensued in consequence. Mr. Hudson was the only surgeon in the regiment, and his arduous professional services, together with exposure to the wet and cold, threw him into a fever, which confined him to bed a long time; and when he arose from his bed, his constitution was shattered—the fever had settled in his left hip, producing lameness, which has continued ever since, increasing with increasing years, until he is now totally disabled. He refrained from asking for a pension as long as he was able to make a living by the practice of his profession; but he is now an old man, unable, from the disability so contracted, to procure the necessities of life, and therefore now asks the aid of his country.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

GEORGE S. CLAFLIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill is one from the House of Representatives, for the relief of George S. Claflin, on which the Senate Committee on Pensions have made an adverse report.

Mr. STUART. Then let it be passed over.

JAMES F. GREEN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of James F. Green, of Pennsylvania.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of J. F. Green, of Bradford county, Pennsylvania, upon the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence February 1, 1850, and to continue during his natural life.

It appears, from the petition of Mr. Green and the testimony of two of his fellow-soldiers, that he was drafted in Orange county, New York, on the 10th of August, 1814, and mustered into service as a member of Captain Halleck's company, of Colonel Belknap's regiment, on the 18th of August, 1814; that he was marched to, and stationed at, Harlem Heights, and while stationed there, and in the line of his duty, he had his right knee crushed and the bone fractured. He was ordered out by his commanding officer to assist in removing some rocks, preparatory to pitching their tents. He was upon the end of a long and heavy lever that they were using in prizing up the rock; the lever gave way and fell, catching and crushing his right knee under it, causing him great pain and totally disabling him from service for some five weeks, which time he remained in the hospital. About this time he partially recovered, and was enabled to continue in service until the 3d of December, at which time he was discharged, his term of service having expired. It appears from the testimony that the disability resulting from the injury has continued and increased; and from the testimony of two surgeons, it appears that owing to the injury Green is totally disabled from procuring a support by manual labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

J. B. KERR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill making compensation to John Bozman Kerr, for diplomatic services in Central America, is the next upon the Calendar.

Mr. EVERETT. That subject has already been disposed of by the Senate. The bill was moved as an amendment to the deficiency bill, and was adopted. I move, therefore, that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LLEWELLYN WASHINGTON.

The bill for the relief of Llewellyn Washington, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Llewellyn Washington, $205 62, for services as a clerk in the Post Office Department from the 1st of May, 1851, until the 14th of July of the same year.

Llewellyn Washington was employed as a temporary clerk in the dead letter office from the 1st of May, 1851, until the 14th of July of the same year, at the rate of $1,000 per annum. The Postmaster General, among his estimates sent to the Treasury Department, asked for $205 62, for the payment of the amount due to Mr. Llewellyn Washington, but from some cause, no appropriation was made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

GENERAL R. B. MASON.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier General Richard B. Mason, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to enact that all the provisions of the act approved February 3, 1853, "for the relief of Brevet Brigadier General Riley, and to enable him to settle his accounts with the United States," be applied to the heirs of Brigadier General Richard B. Mason, in reference to all moneys raised and collected by him for contributions, penalties, internal assessments, duties, or other objects, in California, from June 1, 1847, to April 15, 1849; and to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in settling the accounts of General Mason, to allow as a credit, a commission of one and a half per cent. upon the moneys so raised, collected, and disbursed by him while he was Governor of California, during the time stated.

General Mason succeeded General Kearny in command in California, June 1, 1847, and continued in command until April 15, 1849, when he was relieved by General Riley. A temporary civil government was organized on the conquest, at the head of which was the military officer in command. The government continued of necessity after the close of the war, and General Mason continued to act as governor, until succeeded by General Riley, who exercised the same functions until the organization of the State government, December 20, 1849.

During the war, the collection of duties on articles imported into that country had been made as a military contribution, under authority from the War Department. This authority ceasing with the termination of the war, General Mason then determined to enforce the United States tariff, and to levy duties in the same manner as in the established collection districts of the United States. These collections were continued by General Riley, and the accounts of both General Mason and General Riley were authorized to be settled by the act of 5th February, 1853, for the relief of General Riley.

It seems only just that the same commission as was allowed to General Riley for the collections and disbursements made by him, while civil governor of California, should also be given to the heirs of General Mason for similar services.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

RULIF VAN BRUNT.

The next bill on the Calendar was one for the relief of Rulif Van Brunt.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall have to discuss that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

ISAAC P. SIMONTON.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Isaac P. Simonton was the next upon the Calendar.

Mr. STUART. I move to lay that bill on the table. I wish to look into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If objection be made, the bill must be passed over.

Mr. STUART. My motion is that the bill lie upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. The Senator can object to the bill and have it passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands objection to be made. The bill must therefore go over.

MADISON PARTON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, considered the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Madison Parton.

It is designed to confer upon the accounting officers of the Treasury authority to ascertain whether Madison Parton has been paid for all the military services rendered by him to the United States from the 8th of August 1837, till the 8th of February, 1838, by examining the proper officers and other persons, as well as the proper rolls, of the company to which he belonged; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay such sum of money as may be found to be due.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

HORACE SOUTHMAYD AND SON.

The bill for the relief of Horace Southmayd & Son, reported from the Committee on Finance, was read a second time.

It proposes to require the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Horace Southmayd and Son the amount of drawback to which they would have been entitled, upon the shipment of foreign dutiable goods, shipped by them from New York to Tampico, in the schooner Mary Catharine, which cleared at New York on the 7th of April, 1847, as would have been allowed if those foreign goods had been shipped to some foreign port or place in any country with which the United States were in amity.

Mr. STUART. I object to the consideration of that bill until I can have an opportunity to look into the principle on which it is founded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

ROBERT SEWALL.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of the late Robert Sewall, reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the Third Auditor of the Treasury be directed to audit the claim of the heirs and representatives of the late Robert Sewall, and determine the amount that may be due to them, and report the amount to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is required to cause it to be paid.

In August, 1814, when the British forces were marching upon the Capitol, some men of the American troops, with their arms and ammunition, took possession of a brick house belonging to the father of the petitioner, and for the time converted it into a place of military defense. As the British troops approached the house, they were fired upon by the party in the house and the horse of General Ross and one of his men were killed. Under these circumstances, the house was attacked, taken, and burnt by the enemy, and some of the American party were taken prisoners, and among them, as stated by one of the witnesses, was an American officer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

S. R. ADDISON.

The bill for the relief of Dr. S. R. Addison, passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Assistant Surgeon Addison, the difference of pay between that of his grade and a surgeon, from April 4, 1848, until June 21, 1850, being the period during which he served as surgeon on board the United States sloop-of-war Saint Mary's.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

MANUEL HERNANDEZ.

The bill for the relief of Manuel Hernandez, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize Manuel Hernandez to locate, not exceeding eight hundred arpens of land, French measure, according to the legal subdivisions, on any of the public lands in the State of Florida, subject to private entry, which shall be in full compensation for all the damages he may have sustained in being dispossessed of eight hundred arpens of land, about three miles distant from the mouth of the Escambia river, lying between the lands of Joseph Noriega and those of the free mulatto named Charles, being the same lands that were granted to Joseph Hernandez, deceased, by the Spanish Government, on the 8th of October, 1817; and further to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent for the amount mentioned.

Joseph Hernandez settled upon and cultivated certain lands lying on the bay of Pensacola, and applied, by petition, to the proper authorities of Spain for a grant of those lands which were described as being "about three miles distant from the mouth of the Escambia river, lying and situated between the lands of Joseph Noriega and those of the free mulatto named Charles;" that the usual proceedings were had, and the proper decrees were made, under date of 8th October, 1817, for perfecting the grant of eight hundred arpens of land to him, but there was no actual survey of the land until after the change of Government in 1831. He filed his claim before the commissioners appointed to adjust private land claims in the Territory of Florida, and on the 29th of April, 1834, the commissioners examined the claim, and, as appears from the indorsement on the back of the original grant from the Spanish Government, by the secretary of the commissioners, and also from the affidavit of the secretary, Joseph E. Coro, the claim was confirmed by the commissioners; "but that, by mistake, no record of confirmation was made, and the said claim was not embraced in any of the abstracts of the commissioners' reports."

Hernandez departed this life, and Manuel Hernandez was duly appointed his administrator, and as such administrator sold and conveyed the tract of land to one Pio Millan de la Carrera, as appears from a duly certified copy of the deed, dated 7th August, 1837; and Carrera, on the 2d September, 1837, sold and conveyed by deed to the petitioner, Manuel Hernandez, the lands.

It also appears that, after the survey of the lands in the Territory of Florida, by the Government of the United States, that one William L. Booth entered the lands as public lands, and that an action of ejectment was brought against Booth, in the circuit court of Escambia county, by Manuel Hernandez, which suit he failed to sustain. The petitioner now asks the right to locate lands equal in quantity to the lands of which he was dispossessed. The committee believe, from the evidence, that the commissioners did confirm to Joseph Hernandez eight hundred arpens of land, although they made no record of such confirmation; and that, as he has been dispossessed of the lands in question, justice would require that he should be authorized to locate an equal quantity of lands, on any of the public lands, within the State of Florida, subject to private entry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

SYLVANUS CULVER.

The bill for the relief of Sylvanus Culver, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct a land warrant for one hundred acres to be issued to Sylvanus Culver, the only surviving heir of John Pearson, deceased, in lieu of a land warrant for one hundred acres, issued April, 19, 1806, to Samuel Pearson, in trust for himself and the other heirs of John Pearson, deceased, who was a private in the New York continental line, and which warrant has been lost or destroyed.

On motion by Mr. STUART, the bill was amended by inserting after "one hundred," where it first occurs, the words "and twenty."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

JEAN BAPTISTE BEAUBIEN.

The bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Beaubien, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent or patents to Jean Baptiste Beaubien, for the following lots as described and numbered on the survey and plat of the Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago, in the State of Illinois, made under the order of the Secretary of War, and now on file in the War Office: Lots numbered one, two, three, four, five, and six, of block number four; all that part of lots numbered eight and nine, block number two, which lies south of the line of excavation, authorized by the act of Congress, approved July 21, 1852; and all that part of lot number one, block number five, that lies within the boundaries commencing on the western line of said lot number one, block five, at a point ten feet north of the southern line thereof; thence east parallel with the southern line two hundred and fifty feet to the western boundary of the lands granted by the United States to the Illinois Central Railroad Company; thence north, along the western boundary thirty-four feet to the northern line of lot number one, block five; thence west along the northern line two hundred and fifty feet to the northwest corner thereof; thence south along the western line thereof, thirty-four feet to the place of beginning.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

THOMAS RHODES.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Rhodes, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $3,175 11 to Thomas Rhodes, in full satisfaction for the expenses incurred by him in opening and constructing a road from Mobile, in Alabama, to Pascagoula Bay, for the transportation of the mail, in the year 1828, in pursuance of an implied authority and contract from the Postmaster General.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ROBERT JOYNER.

The bill for the relief of Robert Joyner, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to credit Robert Joyner, in the adjustment of his accounts as naval storekeeper at the Pensacola yard, with the sum of $662 43, being the amount of the cost of sundry articles of clothing and small stores which were stolen from the public store under his charge at the yard.

Mr. EVANS. I should like to hear the report read. It appears to be a rather extraordinary case.

The report was accordingly read.

In April last one of the warehouses connected with the navy-yard, in which the public clothing and small stores were deposited, under the custody of Mr. Joyner, was clandestinely entered at different periods and articles stolen, the cost of which is estimated at $662 43. A committee of officers, appointed by the commandant for that purpose, fully investigated the circumstances, and the result of the investigation, and the testimony of other officers, show, to the satisfaction of the committee, that the loss was not occasioned by any inattention to duty or negligence on the part of the storekeeper, but was owing to the insecurity of the store-rooms. The correspondence and evidence in the case were referred to the Secretary of the Navy, who declined to afford relief without the authority of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PAYMASTERS' CLERKS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill upon the Calendar is one for the relief of paymasters' clerks who served in Mexico, which has been reported adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STUART. Pass that over.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move to concur in the adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that if objection be made the bill must be passed over.

Mr. ATCHISON. Then I move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I think it ought not to be indefinitely postponed. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs who reported it is not here.

Mr. STUART. If there be any desire to have it acted upon, I shall raise the question that it is not a private bill at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that objection being made, the bill must go over.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

JAMES ERWIN.

The bill for the relief of James Erwin, of Arkansas, and others, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to investigate, audit, allow, and pay to James Erwin, of Arkansas, a fair and full remuneration for the actual losses he sustained in consequence of a contract he made with the United States in September, 1834, to supply provisions and transportation for the use of the Creek Indians expected to emigrate from the eastern to the western side of the Mississippi river, but who did not emigrate; and further, to direct the Secretary of War to investigate, audit, allow, and pay to James Erwin, and to the heirs or legal representatives of Daniel Greathouse, deceased, a full and fair remuneration for the actual losses sustained in consequence of a contract made by Erwin and Greathouse, in his lifetime, and the United States, in December, 1835, for the same purpose, but with the provision that in estimating the loss in either case, the Secretary of War shall first ascertain the actual cost of delivering the several articles named in the contract at the places appointed for their delivery, and then what they could have been sold for at auction, or otherwise, in the hands of a prudent agent, and that the difference, if any, shall be considered the sum actually lost.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON subsequently said: Since the filing of the papers in this case, James Erwin has, to my knowledge, died; and the bill should be for the relief of his heirs and legal representatives. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the bill may be amended accordingly.

Mr. BADGER. Insert "personal representatives."

By unanimous consent, the amendment was made.

A. G. BENNETT.

The bill for the relief of A. G. Bennett, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in settling the accounts of Albert G. Bennett, paymaster in the United States Army, to allow him credit for whatever sum of money he may prove, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, to have been lost by him by the burning of the steamboat Volante, between Vicksburg and Yazoo City, November 15, 1853, the amount not to exceed $1,281 80.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

URI EMMONS' PATENT.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of the late

Uri Emmons, reported from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAYARD. I must object to that. I mention in connection with it, though, that one reason is owing to the irregularity with which our reports are filed. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact. On my file the reports and other papers are not regularly filed, and I think the persons whose duty it is to attend to it should do it better than they do. As far as my documents are concerned, neither reports nor bills are regularly filed. I often find myself at a loss when I desire to refer to them.

The bill was passed over.

MICHAEL NOURSE.

The bill for the relief of Michael Nourse, reported from the Committee on Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Michael Nourse, late chief clerk in the office of the Register of the Treasury, the difference between the compensation received by him as chief clerk, and the compensation of the register, for the time that he performed the duties of register under a temporary appointment by the President of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce to the Senate, that the Calendar has now been gone through with.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of James Dixon, praying compensation for extra work done by him on the court-house in the city of Alexandria, while the said city was within the territorial limits of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of Harris Hill, on behalf of himself, and the heirs and legal representatives of William Scott, deceased, praying remuneration for a tract of land granted to the deceased by the Spanish Government, and sold by the United States as public land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Altha A. Hoyle, on behalf of herself and others, heirs of the late George Hoyle, late of Montgomery county, Maryland, praying Congress to pass an act to permit George W. Hoyle to sell and assign a certain land warrant, granted to the said George Hoyle during his lifetime; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHASE presented the petition of R. McCabe, praying a grant of land to the President and Directors of the Cincinnati and Mackinaw Railroad Company, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Greenville to the Straits of Mackinaw; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented seven petitions, signed by Shepherd Knapp and others, pension agents from six States—viz: New York, Ohio, Indiana, Connecticut, New Jersey, and New Hampshire—praying compensation for services rendered; which, together with the papers on the subject already on file, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLIDELL asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of L. E. L. A. Lawson, sole surviving heir of General Eleazer W. Ripley, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHASE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill granting to the Cincinnati and Mackinaw Railroad Company certain land to aid in the construction of said road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BARK ABEONA.

Mr. SLIDELL asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to change the name of the bark Abeona to Mount Vernon; and asked for its immediate consideration.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. No amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

MINNESOTA LAND DISTRICTS.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the bill to establish additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

NOTICES.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to mention to the Senate that I shall be under the necessity of being absent from the city for some ten days, from the beginning of next week, and I shall, therefore, on Monday, if I can have the opportunity, ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill allowing a credit, for a limited period, for duties on railroad iron imported into the United States; which was reported by me from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to give a similar notice. I shall ask the favor of the Senate on Monday next, to take up the bill reported from the select committee on the National railroad, in order that I may present to the Senate my views upon it, as I shall be compelled to be absent from the city to take my family to the Pacific coast.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 7, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, made in compliance with a resolution adopted by the House on the 4th instant, on motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY.]

Mr. OLDS. The communication, I believe, is a reply to a resolution of this House, calling for information about the Alabama mail contract, which was under discussion here a few days ago. I move to dispense with its reading, and to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

SENATE BILLS.

The following bills from the Senate were taken from the Speaker's table, read the first and second times by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

An act for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad, and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Companies. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act for the relief of Hodges & Lansdale, and the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson and Ann E. Johnson. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Watson, deceased. Referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

An act for the relief of William Claude Jones. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TREATIES WITH THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. ORR. As it is my purpose to leave the city this evening, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report of a bill, to have it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill, as follows:

Bill defining the terms on which treaties shall hereafter be made with certain tribes of Indians, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This is a bill that has been reported back from the Committee on Indian Affairs with certain amendments.

Mr. ORR. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that the bill and amendments and report be printed.

It was so ordered.

TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS.

The SPEAKER. The bill to empower the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco, according to time, was pending yesterday when the House passed from the morning hour. The pending motion is to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that proposition the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that the House properly understands the proposition before them. Some gentlemen near me say they do not understand it.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. A motion is pending to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that motion the previous question is demanded.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman who called for the previous question, [Mr. McMULLIN,] whether he will not withdraw that call, so as to enable me to modify my original motion, and to move that the consideration of the bill be postponed for three weeks, so that it may not go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? I hope the gentleman from Virginia will so far favor me.

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot withdraw my call for that purpose.

The question being on seconding the call for the previous question;

Mr. TROUT demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and Cox were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 33.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum voting.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to. The roll was then called, and the Chair announced that there was a quorum, 138 members having answered to their names.

Mr. HAMILTON moved that all further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER here obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. When a call of the House was ordered, the House was dividing upon a call for the previous question, and that business is first in order. Until that is disposed of, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] cannot be entitled to the floor for any purpose.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. LATHAM. I ask the gentleman who made the call for tellers, and also the gentleman who moved the previous question, to withdraw those motions, in order that I may be heard a moment upon the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Tellers have been ordered by the House, and the call cannot be withdrawn.

The tellers resumed their places; and the question being taken, they reported—ayes 66, noes 67.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ORR. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to this day three weeks, and that the bill and amendment be printed.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. That is the motion I was about to make.

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope that order will not be made. This is a bill that we can now dispose of as well as at any other time; and we are postponing and making special orders of too many bills.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HAMILTON. Then I move the previous question.

Mr. JONES. Upon what does the gentleman call the previous question?

Mr. HAMILTON. Upon the motion to postpone.

Mr. JONES. The previous question cannot be called upon that motion. I suppose the previous question, if seconded, will apply to the engrossment of the bill, and that will, as I understand it, cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. ORR. It will have that effect under the rule, and I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The SPEAKER. The previous question would cut off the motion to postpone, but not that to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ORR. But that is not the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that such a motion is pending.

Mr. ORR. But the motion to postpone is not debatable; and I understand that the House is brought to a direct vote upon that question.

The SPEAKER. That will be the first question before the House, if the previous question is not seconded; but if it is, the motion will be cut off.

Mr. ORR. Then I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. McMULLIN. Can the Chair entertain that motion while there was pending a motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. A motion was made to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Then came a motion that the further consideration of the bill be postponed; and after that, a motion that the bill do lie upon the table. The Chair conceives the latter motion to be in order.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope that the motion will be voted down, and that the bill will, at least, be allowed to live for three weeks. I demand the yeas and nays on the question.

[Cries of "No;" "Call for tellers."]

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I withdraw the call for yeas and nays, and demand tellers.

Mr. LETCHER. I renew the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion that the bill do lie upon the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethie, Ball, Bell, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chrisman, Crocker, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmundson, Etheridge, Farley, Flagler, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hemi, Hiester, Hill, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glinney Jones, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Letcher, Lindley, Macdonald, McMullin, Matteson, Mayall, Meacham, John G. Miller, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Phelps, Pratt, Robbins, Ruffin, Sabin, Seward, Seymour, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, John J. Taylor, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Banks, Barkstale, Benson, Bissell, Bugg, Campbell, Chandler, Chastain, Churchill, Clugman, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Cullom, Dent, Dickinson, Disney, Dowdell, Edgerton, Elliott, Ellison, English, Everhart, Fenton, Fuller, Grey, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hibbard, Hughes, Hunt, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Latham, Lindsley, McDougall, Mace, Macy, May, Miller, Olds, Orr, Parker, Pennington, John Perkins, Ready, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Rowe, Sage, Sapp, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walsh, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—78.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. LATHAM. I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his call for the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The question, even then, would not be debatable.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. What is the state of the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is on seconding the demand for the previous question. There is a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There is also another motion to postpone to a day certain, which is not debatable.

Mr. LATHAM. Then I would ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion to postpone, so that I may be heard on the subject.

Mr. ORR. I will gratify the gentleman by withdrawing my motion, if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] will withdraw his call for the previous question, provided he will renew the motion to postpone when he has concluded the remarks he proposes to make.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the gentleman from South Carolina will withdraw unconditionally the motion to postpone, I will withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. ORR. I cannot withdraw the motion to postpone to a day certain, unconditionally.

The question was then taken; and the House refused to second the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to postpone the consideration of the bill to a day certain.

Mr. LATHAM. I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw that motion.

Mr. ORR. I do withdraw it, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. LATHAM. I will.

The SPEAKER. Then the question now is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, the bill which the House has under consideration now, is one affecting so vitally the interests of my constituents, that I cannot consent it shall be disposed of without having an opportunity of expressing what I deem are the interests, not only of the State of California, but of the General Government, in the matter. I am not prepared to say that I am in favor of the bill before the House in its details, because I think that there might be a substitute introduced which would more effectually carry out what is intended.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] in his remarks on yesterday, upon this bill, took occasion to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Post Office Department is not now a self-sustaining branch of the Government; but that, on the contrary, it is a tax on the Treasury, and there has to be an annual appropriation in order to meet the necessary expenditures.

However true that may be—and I am prepared to indorse all of the sentiments he expressed—I say, that one of the reasons why that very state of things exists, so far as the mail between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts is concerned, originates in the law now in existence. The principle of this bill is intended to remedy this defect; and, if it is adopted by Congress, it will be found that it will effect the very result which the gentleman desires, to wit: that the Post Office Department shall be a self-sustaining branch of the Government.

Now, what are the facts? At present the mail is carried between the cities of New York and San Francisco for $850,000 per annum. The average length of time by the Panama route—by which route the mail is carried—is about thirty days. It has been done in twenty-five days; but the average time will be found to be thirty days. There are two large express companies, Adams & Co. and Wells, Fargo & Co., which carry mail matter by Nicaragua, charging from twenty-five to fifty cents on a letter; and the trip is made in twenty-two and twenty-three days. The result is, that all commercial men throughout the country avail themselves of these facilities, as the most expeditious and the best calculated to carry out their purpose, to wit: to expedite them in the delivery of messages which materially affect their interests.

The mail matter, therefore, which is carried by these express companies, amounts to about one third of the regular United States mails; and thus the Department is cut off from about one third of its revenue, which goes to the maintenance of these large express companies.

Now, what does this bill propose? It proposes that when the Government ascertains that a mail can be carried by any other route than the one established, in a more expeditious manner, its contract shall terminate with the existing route, and shall be given to that route which will carry it more expeditiously.

There are four routes between the Atlantic and the Pacific now occupying the attention of men of capital—the Panama route, the Nicaragua route, the Tehuantepec route, and the route between New Orleans, Vera Cruz, and Acapulco. I have no doubt in my own mind that the mails will be eventually carried in fifteen days. I believe that the mail between New Orleans and San Francisco can be carried safely by the Vera Cruz and Acapulco route in fifteen days. But I do not believe that it will ever be carried in ten days, at a cost to the Government, under this bill, of $1,600,000, which seems to be the great objection of many gentlemen to the bill. You now pay $850,000 to carry the mails in from twenty-seven to thirty days.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Nine hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. LATHAM. Nine hundred and sixty thousand dollars, the gentleman from Tennessee says. This bill proposes that the mail shall be carried in twenty-five days for $10,000. And if the time is reduced to fifteen days—which, in my opinion is the lowest possible limit that it can be carried—it will cost $1,000,000, or but little over what the Government is now paying for the transportation of the mail by the Panama route in twenty-seven to thirty days.

Now, what I desire to call the attention of the House to more particularly, is, that the principles of this bill are right. If the Government desires to relieve itself from the burden of taxation in carrying and keeping up the mail between the Atlantic and Pacific coast, it must adopt this principle, or it cannot possibly relieve itself from a large burden of taxation laid upon its shoulders. I wish to say, further—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from California allow me to say that I have not received a single letter from California for months.

Mr. LATHAM. That is the true condition of things; and so far do I know such delay in receiving letters from California to be true, that the really important matter which comes to me as a member of this body I receive regularly by the express companies, and it reaches me some five or six days before the mail reaches me. And this is the case in the experience of the commercial men of the country. It is these express companies which relieve the Post Office Department of that income which it should properly receive, and which should go towards sustaining the route that is at any time established.

I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact. If you send this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the result will be that the bill will never be reached, and this Congress will adjourn without being able to obtain any action whatever upon it, whether it contains merits or not. If the consideration of the bill is postponed for three weeks, why then the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads can investigate this matter; they can see whether this bill is capable of being amended in its details—and, for one, I think it is—and the bill can then be properly reached.

The committee can amend the bill so as to relieve the Government from debt, and obviate the very objections which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] has expressed against the bill, and which I know are entertained by other gentlemen upon this floor. When it comes up for consideration at the expiration of three weeks, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads can report a substitute and amendments, and then it can be discussed fully by the House, and the result will be that the Government can carry out that principle, which we all know will tend to relieve the Post Office Department from that burden of taxation which is now imposed upon it. I now renew the motion made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] that the consideration of the bill be postponed for three weeks.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. LATHAM] yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. LATHAM. I cannot do so without the consent of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.]

Mr. McMULLIN. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina, as well as the gentleman from California, if they will not consent to withdraw the motion for only two or three minutes?

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] will promise to renew the motion, so far as I am concerned, I will give the gentleman from California permission to withdraw the motion.

Mr. LATHAM. Having the permission of the gentleman from South Carolina, I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. McMULLIN. I think if the House will examine the bill for a moment they will see the importance of referring it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Yesterday when I addressed the House, I remarked that I was not prepared to say whether I should vote for or against the bill—that it was a new proposition sprung upon the House for the first time. Since that time, however, I have been looking somewhat into this question.

If you pass this bill in its present shape, or even when amended as indicated by the gentleman from California, [Mr. LATHAM,] what will be the practical effect upon the country? There are, as you have been informed by the gentleman from California, three or four routes over which the mail may be carried. Do you mean to say—do you mean that this Congress shall say—that you will so frame the bill as to compel the Postmaster General to give this mail service into the hands of any particular individual or company?

I undertake to say, if you examine the practical effect of this bill, that you will establish a monopoly in favor of the Tehuantepec route. And, sir, it may cost this Government, annually, on that route, from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 to carry the mail from New Orleans to the city of San Francisco. Is the House prepared to confer authority on the Postmaster General to pay $1,500,000 for carrying the mail from any one point of this country to another?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to ask my colleague a question, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. McMULLIN. Certainly; I will yield for a question to be asked.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I wish the House to understand, and I wish my colleague [Mr. McMULLIN] to understand, that the object proposed to be accomplished by this bill is to diminish the cost of transporting the mail between New Orleans and San Francisco, and to increase the revenue to the Post Office Department from that service. I ask my colleague if the reason why the rural districts have been neglected—and I agree with him in the desire to improve post office facilities in the rural districts—has not been on account of the absorption of the income from the Post Office Department by these great lines?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if by the project of this bill—and I believe in my soul such will be the result—the expenses of the transportation of the mail be diminished, and the revenue of the Post Office Department be increased, I ask whether the natural effect of it will not be that the rural post office business—to be a little facetious—will “smile and blossom as the rose?”

Mr. McMULLIN. I have no doubt that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is of opinion that this bill will effect a reduction of the expenses of the Government; but I tell him that the bill will not effect the objects which it professes to secure. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] or the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to have the letter of the Postmaster General on this question read to the House. I understand it is in his possession.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. And I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] to refer to the Globe of yesterday, and he will see that the letter of the Postmaster General, to which he alludes, has been published at my request.

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Speaker, I send the Globe to the Clerk's desk, and ask that the letter of the Postmaster General, published therein, be read for the information of the House.

Mr. LATHAM. I ask also that the sixth section of this bill be read at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, is the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour is not expired by three minutes.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the sixth section of the bill, and afterwards the letter of the Postmaster General on the subject, as published in the Globe.

The sixth section of the bill is as follows:

“SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if at any time during the existence of this contract, any other individuals or company shall establish a more speedy conveyance of the mails between New Orleans and San Francisco, and shall give proof to the Postmaster General that said conveyance has been in successful operation for three consecutive months, then and in that case it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to transfer this contract to said individual or company, whereupon the former company or individual shall not be deemed to have any claim for damage, or otherwise, against the Government.”

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire to inform the House that this letter has reference to the original bill, and therefore it does not apply to the bill under consideration at the present time.

Mr. McMULLIN. I flatter myself, Mr. Speaker, that I need not further trespass upon the time of the House, after they have heard read the letter of the Postmaster General in reference to this question. Are gentlemen prepared to say; is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] himself prepared to say; is my colleague prepared to say, that they understand this matter better than the Postmaster General, a gentleman who has been placed at the head of that Department, and whose whole time and talent have been devoted to it?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I would inquire of the gentleman from Virginia how long that gentleman has been Postmaster General?

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman knows as well as I do; most of the times since the coming in of the present Administration. I would ask the gentleman how long he has had charge of this bill?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I have had charge of it for about two years; ever since the vote which was had upon increasing the compensation of the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. McMULLIN. I state, with all due deference to the gentleman from Tennessee, that it is to be presumed that the Postmaster General understands the interests of the Government, in its postal arrangements, as well, at least, as the gentleman from Tennessee. Is this House, in the face of the declarations of that letter; in the face of the information given upon the call of the committee, that under the former bill it would cost this Government upwards of $2,000,000, prepared to pass this bill?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. With due deference to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, and with all respect for the honorable the Postmaster General, I would remind the gentleman that that officer is but a man, fallible like ourselves, and just as liable to err. Hence his opinion should be considered and weighed well, even if it be yielded to. We are here a part of a coördinate branch of the Government, and have a right to determine for ourselves upon all the facts connected with the case.

Mr. EDGERTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman from Ohio has not the floor to make a motion to go into committee, if that is his intention.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, it is in order to make a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I desire to ask if this is not objection day?

The SPEAKER. It is objection day.

Mr. EDGERTON. And for that very reason we ought to go into the Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar. There are several bills upon the Calendar, the reports accompanying which can be read, and perhaps some of the bills be passed. It is due to those interested in private claims that we should once in a while go into Committee on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion for a moment, and allow me to make a report from the Committee on Private Lands Claims, by the unanimous consent of the House, merely for the purpose of reference.

Mr. EDGERTON. I should be glad to accommodate the gentleman; but I will say to him that the Committee of Claims have a large number of claims which they are very anxious to report at the earliest possible moment; and if any favoritism is to be shown to any committee, I think it should be to ours.

Mr. LANE. I will say to the gentleman that I think of going home shortly, at least I shall probably be absent from the city, and I hope he will allow me to make the report.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. EDGERTON. No, sir, I will not withdraw the motion; but if no gentleman objects to the introduction of the report from the Committee on Private Land Claims, I will not.

There being no objection—

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title as follows, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report, ordered to be printed:

A bill authorizing Robert Graham to locate six thousand nine hundred and ninety-three acres of land in lieu of the one undivided half part of certain lands patented to John Edgar and John Murray St. Clair by the Governor of the Northeastern Territory.

Mr. PARKER. I desire the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a report from the Committee on the Judiciary upon a very important subject.

Mr. EDGERTON. I will state to the House that I am informed by the Clerk that the bills and reports which have lately been referred to a Committee of the Whole House have not been printed. This is objection day, and if, as I understand is the fact, there are no bills upon the Private Calendar which have been printed, except those which were read the last objection day—about eight cases—there can be no object in going into Committee of the Whole House. I will therefore withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is a motion pending, made by myself, to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had not the right to take the floor from the gentleman from Virginia for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it competent for me to arrest the debate for the purpose of moving to go to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move, then, that the House go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the House will go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now submit the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MARTHA WASHINGTON CASE.

Mr. PARKER. I now ask the indulgence of the House to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary upon a very important subject, requiring our immediate action, and to which I am very sure there will not be an objection when it is understood. It is in reference to the burning of the steamboat Martha Washington. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his motion for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I apprehend no withdrawal is necessary, if the gentleman has the indulgence of the House to make the motion. I certainly shall not object.

There being no objection,

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, introduced the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title:

A bill to defray the expenses growing out of the burning of the steamboat Martha Washington.

Mr. LATHAM. I hope the House will indulge me in having the bill put upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it is in order, I move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I understand it makes an appropriation, and I think it should go there.

Mr. PARKER. It does make an appropriation; but if the House will listen to me for a moment, I think there will be no objection to paying it, without being considered in Committee of the Whole. This is a matter growing out of the burning of the steamboat Martha Washington, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary yesterday. That committee held a special session this morning, to take the subject into consideration; and they thought it of sufficient importance to warrant them in calling the attention of the House to it to-day.

It will be recollected, because it is a matter, I believe, of universal notoriety, that some two years ago this steamboat was burned on the lower Mississippi, under circumstances which satisfy the public mind, I think, that there was not only connected with that matter one of the most stupendous frauds ever known in this country, but over and above that, the high crimes of arson and murder; for no less than sixteen persons lost their lives in the conflagration. The country has been at immense pains during these two years, for the purpose of bringing these offenders to justice. Facts have transpired recently to satisfy the Judiciary Committee that nine individuals now incarcerated at Helena—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The rules of the House require that a bill making an appropriation must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. I myself cannot see how this Government has anything to do with the crime of burning that steamboat, or the payment of the judicial expenses in prosecuting the criminals.

Mr. PARKER. I will explain to my friend from Tennessee, and am satisfied that he will raise no objection, if he understands the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from Indiana shall proceed?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Some four or five of the persons who were supposed to be implicated—in fact, there is no doubt about their implication in that great crime—were arrested under a law of the United States making a conspiracy under such circumstances highly criminal. They were tried in the courts of the United States in the State of Ohio. For the want of testimony, which has quite recently come to light, those individuals were acquitted. They have since been arrested under the requisition of the Governor of Arkansas, and some nine of them, whom the committee deem unquestionably guilty, are in jail at Helena, in the State of Arkansas. The preliminary examination comes on in ten days from this date, on the 17th of this month; and it is a matter deemed of immense importance to the country that those persons should be vigilantly and thoroughly prosecuted. As I said before, murder and arson, as well as a most stupendous fraud, are involved in this matter; and it is deemed unsafe to leave this thing in the attitude in which it now stands, to be prosecuted by a weak county—the county of Phillips in the State of Arkansas—without some aid. It is the object of the bill to afford that aid, and make some reparation for those who have expended their own means in the arrest of these individuals, under the requisition of the Governor of Arkansas.

I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that I have said enough. I do not wish to detain the House further. This matter is one of universal notoriety, and one which has attracted the attention of every member on this floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. STANTON. I will simply reply to the remark or objection of my colleague over the way, that the bill reported provides that no part of this money shall be expended towards a prosecution in State courts, unless the Secretary shall be satisfied that the crime and the circumstances of its perpetration involve also a violation of the laws of the United States, in order to meet the scruples of some gentlemen who have a difficulty in reference to such application of the public fund.

I will remark further, which my friend from Indiana seems to have omitted in his statement, that this band of confederates extends from the city of New York, through all the eastern and western States, as far as New Orleans; and that it has been necessary to send to almost every State of the Union, or at least numbers of them, in order to arrest these criminals. And there is an equal necessity to send to those different States for the purpose of getting the witnesses.

Now, when it is remembered that this crime was conceived in the city of Cincinnati, persons having confederated for the purpose of effecting large insurance on fictitious articles on board of this steamboat, purporting to be packed in boxes which contained nothing but trumpery, and when this boat was fired in the State of Arkansas, on her passage down the river, while incidentally or accidentally passing through the jurisdiction of that State, it is very clear, as the Secretary of State says, that the local interests of Arkansas, and especially of the county of Phillips, in this crime, bears no comparison to the general interests of the whole people of the United States, in bringing the offenders to justice; and it was upon this view that the Committee on the Judiciary thought themselves justified in reporting this bill, under the urgent circumstances of the case.

Now, the county of Phillips, on the Mississippi river, is comparatively a poor county—rich in lands, but sparsely populated; and this prosecution will require an expenditure of thousands of dollars for the purpose of effecting justice. And what interest have the people of Phillips county, in Arkansas, in bringing these parties to justice? What interest have they in imposing upon themselves the heavy burden of taxation which will be necessary to meet the expenses of the prosecution? Sir, they have no interest in it.

This crime was committed on the bosom of the Mississippi river, which is a great highway of the nation, connecting together a number of the States of the Union, and, therefore, entitled to be called, in the language of Mr. Calhoun, "an inland sea." If this crime had been committed on any of the tide waters of the country, it would have been within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; but as the Mississippi river is not affected by the tides of the Gulf, it is not within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

Mr. PARKER. I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has already been said. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his motion, and allow the bill to pass.

Mr. JONES. I have heard no reason which, I think, should satisfy any one that this is a case to which the United States should be a party, or of which the United States should be made to pay the expenses.

If this Government is to be made to take jurisdiction of all offenses that are to be committed upon the rivers of the country, and upon the steamers and other crafts upon the waters of the country, it will in a short time extend itself to all the railroads of the country. Are not the railroads at present as much highways of the country as the Mississippi river is? Sir, this Government would be absorbing, in my opinion, the domestic concerns of the States—things which legitimately and of themselves belong to the States, and not to this Government. The tendency of things is too much to centralization—to the absorption of everything which pertains to the States within the power and jurisdiction of the General Government.

I do not know what are the particular laws of the State of Arkansas. The county of Phillips may be poor; but I do not suppose that, because this offense has to be prosecuted in that county, because it is there that these persons are to be tried, necessarily, or under the laws of that State, the county of Phillips must pay the expenses of the prosecution. In the State in which I live, the county furnishes the jury, but all the other expenses, for witnesses, attorney's fees, and everything, save the per diem of the jurors, are paid by the State, in all cases of felony.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I have myself practiced in the State of Arkansas, and I learn this morning from one of the Senators from that State, who, I know very well, is an extensive practitioner in that State, that the expense of this prosecution must be paid by the county of Phillips. And even if it did come from the treasury of the State, the State of Arkansas has just as little interest in this matter as the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. PARKER. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] will allow me, I will make a suggestion which I think will relieve him from difficulty. It is a mere matter of form, at most, that this case is now in the State court. Although there are some four or five of these individuals who have been arrested for conspiracy under the laws of the United States, there are some four or five others who have never been arrested and tried; and it would be the duty of the General Government, in my estimation, to say that those men held in custody should not go at large until they are indicted for the crime for which they stand committed against the United States. For that reason alone, if there were no other merits in the case, I think that the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is but one reason, in my opinion, for coming with this case here at all; and that is, that the United States have a full Treasury, and are able to pay this expense, and that these people may get the expenses of this prosecution out of the National Treasury. Where are the owners of this steamboat? Where are the individuals who suffered by this crime? Where are all the interests—the steamboat interests—that are involved in a crime of this character, committed upon these western waters? Those interests are certainly adequate and able to meet, to defray, the expenses of this case. It would, at any rate, be establishing a dangerous precedent, for this Government to take the jurisdiction of, and defray the expenses of, crimes and misdemeanors committed within the jurisdiction of a State. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule which requires that bills of this character should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made by the gentleman from Tennessee, the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PARKER. If the House will indulge me, I will move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up and considering this bill.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done, as the House can only resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon a particular subject.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to make a suggestion to the House in relation to this bill. I have no expectation that the House will pause in its evident intention to take means for passing this bill. It strikes me that this is a very objectionable proceeding indeed. What is it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. PARKER. Is my motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not competent for the House to determine that it will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon that particular bill. It can only go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally.

Mr. PARKER. I hope that the bill will be re-committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which must be first put.

The question was put; and decided in the negative.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does not the bill go, as a matter of course, to the Committee of the Whole, containing, as it does, an appropriation of money?

Mr. PARKER. I withdraw the motion I made that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and will allow the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. If no objection is made, the bill will be so referred, and printed. The question now pending is, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

RELIEF OF HARRIET LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the following bill; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

Act for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth.

The House then agreed to the motion to go into committee.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair.)

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, at its last sitting, had under consideration the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, on which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CARUTHERS] is entitled to the floor.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. CARUTHERS said that he did not propose to dwell on the necessity for organizing territorial governments for Nebraska and Kansas. He would content himself with remarking that the last House of Representatives, in obedience to the known wishes of the people, passed a bill for this purpose.

The resistance to the proposed organization was founded on two grounds. The one, that it violates our treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and involves the violation of good faith and party obligation by repealing the eighth section of the act of March 6, 1820. So far as the first objection goes, the Indian rights are well protected.

He proposed to come to the immediate consideration of the high question of honor and good faith involved in this bill. The question, he said, overrides all party considerations. It is true it is presented as an Administration measure, and it is true that he was here as a Whig; but he was not here to oppose any Administration measure because it is thus brought forward. He was here to follow to the end the dictates of his own judgment. He believed that the Administration has, on this subject, taken high national ground, and planted itself on the great American principle of self-government—which is not involved in any mere party issues—the right of the people to determine for themselves the character of their domestic institutions. He held to the doctrine of congressional non-intervention.

As to the sacredness of the Missouri compact, the North violated it in less than twelve months from the time of its passage. That measure was cradled in a tempest, and has been true to its origin; for, from that day to 1850, the Abolitionists have from year to year become stronger from the slavery excitement. He contended that we shall never have peace until the subject is expelled from these Halls. Expel it, and the occupation of the agitators will be gone.

In conclusion, he eloquently spoke of the North and the South, of their past glories, and their present obligations jointly to uphold the Constitution of the country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, said that he did not propose, in discussing the Nebraska-Kansas bill, to submit any remarks in reference to the Badger amendment. He should pass it by as a matter of no practical importance. It was sufficient for him that this bill, with or without that amendment, opened all our unorganized territory to slavery; and this, too, in derogation of a compact solemnly entered into, the intention of which, from the very nature of things, must have been to consecrate to freedom this vast territory, so long as the State of Missouri should exist; for one part of the compromise was to have been as durable as the other.

He then replied to the argument that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional, and contended that not only had Congress, under the Constitution, the power to enact it, but that it was now its duty to maintain it.

He repudiated the idea that the bill contained the principle of non-intervention, and cited its provisions to prove that it did intervene.

[These speeches will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. MACDONALD obtained the floor.

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask the gentleman to give way for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. RIDDLE. I then submit that motion.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill commonly known as the civil and diplomatic bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of SIDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., his Private Secretary, informing the House that the President had signed the bill authorizing the construction of six first-class steam frigates, and for other purposes.]

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to ask the consent of the House that the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to correct a clerical error in the report made by us on yesterday.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for a division on the question, for tellers, and for the yeas and nays. [Laughter.]

Tellers were not ordered, only fourteen voting in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES. Now I demand the yeas and nays. If the yeas and nays be refused, I ask a division of the House on the question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put on the motion to adjourn over until Monday; and on a division, there were—yeas 93, noes 20; no quorum.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I demand tellers on the question.

The SPEAKER. Tellers and yeas and nays have been both refused.

Mr. STANTON. I had understood that only tellers on the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman from Delaware withdraws his motion, I will renew it, and we can then have another test of the sense of the House.

Mr. RIDDLE. I withdraw the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. ORR. I renew it.

Mr. JONES. And I ask for the yeas and nays. [Laughter.]

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—yeas 103, noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. This morning a bill "for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company, and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company," was referred to the Committee of Claims, I believe, at the suggestion of the Chair. Since that reference was made, some papers have been placed in my hands, from which I learn that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who is absent from his seat, but is expected to be back in a few days, has charge of the matter, and wishes to give it a particular direction. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which that bill was so referred, and I ask that the motion to reconsider may be entered, and lie over until the return of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion to reconsider was accordingly entered for future consideration.

Mr. BISSELL. I think it would be well to refer the Senate bills upon the Speaker's table, as they are rapidly accumulating. I therefore move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It took sometime to count a quorum just now on the motion to adjourn over; and it is evident that there is not a working quorum here. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at half-past three o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned until Monday, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

Smith, for compensation for a certain tract of land at Sitico, Old Town, Tennessee, sold by the Legislature of that State, under misrepresentations made to them; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom was referred the memorial of the Ohio Falls Marine Railroad Company, praying the aid of the United States in the construction of a marine railway for the transportation of steamboats around the Falls of the Ohio, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. MASON gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to extend their railroad to a point on the Potomac river, at or near the city of Washington.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BRIGHT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to keep and receive the public money, under the fifteenth section of the act of 6th August, 1846, for the additional services required under that act," approved March 2, 1853; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT DETROIT.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a custom house, and also an appropriation for the construction of a marine hospital, at Detroit, in the State of Michigan.

MAILS IN UPPER PENINSULA OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the mail facilities in the Upper Peninsula of the State of Michigan.

CORRESPONDENCE OF HON. D. D. BARNARD.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence of Mr. Barnard, late Minister of the United States in Prussia, with the United States consul at Bremen, and of that consul with the Government of Bremen, relative to the case of Mr. Conrad Schmidt, a naturalized citizen of the United States, arrested at Bremen, and detained there upon a requisition from the Government of Hanover, claiming Schmidt as a subject of that kingdom.

Also, a copy of a letter addressed by Mr. Barnard, while Minister of the United States at Berlin, to his Majesty the King of Prussia, in October, 1852, on the subject of religious toleration, and of a dispatch addressed by Mr. Barnard to the Department of State, in reference thereto.

Also, copies of the correspondence of the Legation of the United States at Berlin, with the Minister of the Grand Duke of Baden, at Berlin, in regard to the arrest and maltreatment of E. T. Dana, W. B. Dwight, and Dr. Ramsey, citizens of the United States, at Heidelberg, in the Grand Duchy of Baden.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. BADGER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to introduce a bill, and have it passed now, of which no notice has been given; and I am sure that, when I state what it is, there will be no objection. We passed an act in the year 1850, authorizing notaries public to take and certify affidavits in certain cases. By a second section of the bill, put to it, it was extended and included the District of Columbia. In some way or other in the engrossment of the bill, the District of Columbia was left out. The object of the bill which I wish to introduce, is simply to extend the provisions of that act to the District of Columbia. It was an oversight by which it was left out in the engrossment of that bill. I now ask leave of the Senate to enable me to introduce a bill supplementary to the act entitled, "An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases."

Leave was granted, and the bill was read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to enact that all the powers and authority conferred in and by the act referred to, approved September 16, 1850, upon notaries public, in the States and Territories, be vested in notaries public within the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHASE. When this bill was before the Senate on a former occasion, an amendment was made to it authorizing notaries public throughout the country to take depositions to be used in the courts of the United States. I should be glad to have that amendment made to this bill, and I hope it will be passed over for the purpose of making it.

Mr. BADGER. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHASE. I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. EDWARDS.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate on Friday last passed House bill for the relief of William B. Edwards, for the purpose of making an amendment which ought to have been made but was overlooked.

The motion was agreed to; and the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading was also reconsidered.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I move to amend by striking out "four" from the words "eighteen hundred and fifty-four." It was put in by a clerical mistake, in the engrossment of the bill. The pension will then commence in "eighteen hundred and fifty."

The amendment was agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read a third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill reported from the select committee "for the construction of a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean."

Mr. BADGER. I had proposed to ask the Senate to take up, this morning, the bill which I indicated on last Friday; but I am not at all disposed to interfere with the Senator from California, who, I know, is so situated as to make it highly important to him to be able to do to-day what he proposes to do. I shall, therefore, give way to him very cheerfully; but, as I am under the necessity of leaving town, I hope the Senate will oblige me to-morrow, by taking up that bill in the morning hour.

Mr. EVANS. The bill to provide for the claims of the officers of the Revolutionary Army was made the special order for to-day. I have no disposition to interfere with other gentlemen, but I am afraid that if that bill is pushed out of its place now, I shall have some difficulty in getting it up again. I should prefer to have it considered now, and I do not think it will occupy half an hour. I say to the gentleman from California, however, that if it is likely to lead to debate, I will move myself for its continuance, so as to enable him to go on with his speech; but if we could dispose of that bill this morning, it would be very desirable to do so.

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to intrude on the Senator from South Carolina, but I should be much obliged to him if he would permit me to occupy some time this morning in giving my views on the subject of the Pacific railroad. I shall be necessarily away from the city in a day or two; at least I shall be called out of my place in the Senate. I will certainly aid the Senator in getting up his bill at any reasonable time.

Mr. MASON. The Senate are aware of the necessity, on my part, as I conceive, to ask them to proceed to the consideration of Executive business in preference to any other. The Senator from California, however, spoke to me this morning, and for considerations which I fully appreciate, personal to himself, asked that he might have the opportunity of being heard upon his favorite railroad scheme for a short time, and I told him that he should certainly have my consent, with the assent of the Senate that after that was done I should move for an Executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the construction of a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, the history of the country presents no instance of a measure of great national importance in which there has been such unanimity of public sentiment in its favor as the project of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific by means of Railway. We are left in no doubt as to the judgment of the American people on this subject. The agricultural, commercial, mechanical, and manufacturing interests; our statesmen who held, and who now hold high places in the councils of the nation; our citizens in primary assemblies, and Legislatures of Sovereign States, have declared in its favor; and the Press, in its power, in terms not to be misunderstood, has echoed and re-echoed public opinion in its support, from one end of the Union to the other. Yet nothing definite, thus far, has been done, although appeals have again and again been made to the Congress of the United States to take the initiative in this great measure. Upon what plea can we go before the tribunal of public opinion, and excuse ourselves for longer delay? With an overflowing Treasury, whose annual accumulations are a source of embarrassment, reversing the experience of all other nations, and happy in the quiet, yet progressive development of the arts of peace, without a speck of war threatening our horizon, what time more propitious than the present for us to act in this matter, so earnestly pressed upon us by public sentiment, and which the Chief Magistrate has so distinctly recommended in his annual message to Congress?

Ask me "for anything but time," said the great Napoleon, "and you shall have it." Is there any Senator, friendly to this measure, who is insensible to the importance of immediate legislation in regard to it? Individuals, for a few fleeting years, perform their part, and, one after another, soon pass off the theater of human affairs. Their usefulness in the role of life is then seen in the wisdom of their policy, of which posterity will best judge. The necessity for this work, in a thousand forms, crowds upon the mind as we survey our present condition, our capacities, our wants. The enriching power of trade, foreign and domestic, and the prospect of our advance in greatness, are the inducements to begin it now. The results no one, at this time, can properly estimate.

The Select Committee charged with this subject have given it that careful examination which its importance demands, and have instructed me, as Chairman, to report the bill now under consideration. To secure prompt, cordial, and, if possible, unanimity of action, we have endeavored carefully to exclude everything that might give rise to constitutional doubt or objection, or tend in any manner to create local or sectional prejudices.

It proposes a grant of land by the Government similar to that repeatedly conceded from the days of President Monroe,—thirty years ago,—down, through every successive Administration, to the present period, with a reasonable compensation for carrying the United States mails. It establishes no eastern terminus. It gives no preference to any State in the great valley of the Mississippi—no advantage to any particular locality, except that given by nature herself; and assigns the contract, on ample security, to the best bidder, after full and fair competition. The means are no more than adequate to secure the result, and not a dollar is to be paid from the National Treasury except for service performed. By this bill the mail will be carried daily, both ways, in less than a week, from our Atlantic and Pacific borders, for little more than it now costs for a semi-monthly mail, occupying near four weeks in the transit. Without the road, the lands are valueless; but with it the alternate sections will bring millions of dollars into the Treasury, whilst an enterprising and industrious population will settle, cultivate, and rapidly fill up the country on either side of the route from the Mississippi to the Pacific.

Is it not our clear constitutional right to construct this great highway through the territory of the United States? Could language be more explicit than the delegation of authority in the fourth article of the Constitution, for Congress "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States;" coupled with the power given in the first article, "to establish post offices and post roads;" saying nothing of those powers naturally flowing out of that instrument to carry out its great purposes? The POSTAL SYSTEM was stipulated for, even under the Confederation. In the ninth article, Congress had the exclusive right of "establishing and regulating post offices from one State to another throughout the United States, and exacting such postage on the papers passing through the same as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the said office." When the original draft of the Constitution was prepared, it only proposed to give Congress "the power to establish post offices," but it was subsequently amended by adding "and post roads," in which form it was adopted without opposition.

The Federalist, in an article prepared by Mr. Madison, in discussing the provisions of the proposed new form of Government, declared that "the power of establishing post roads must, in every view, be a harmless power; and may, perhaps, by judicious management, become productive of great public convenience. Nothing which tends to facilitate the intercourse between the States can be deemed unworthy of the public care."

The Articles of Confederation had been projected before the date of our act of independence. On the 11th of June, 1776, the revolutionary Congress resolved that "a committee be appointed to prepare and digest the form of a confederation to be entered into between the Colonies." Their ratification, however, did not begin until 1778, and was not consummated until 1st March, 1781. From this period until the year 1789, when, on the 4th of March, the First Congress met under the new Constitution, the power given in respect to the postal system resulted in the establishment of seventy-five post offices, with a total extent of mail route of 1,875 miles, at a cost for mail transportation of $22,081. The efficacy of the new and enlarged delegation of power in the Constitution appears in the fact that, in the ten years immediately preceding the beginning of the present century, a little over the period in which the postal system had existed under the Confederation, the number of post offices in the Union rose to 903, with an extent of post route of 20,817 miles, at a cost of mail transportation of $128,644. The succeeding ten years it increased to 2,300 post offices, with 36,406 miles of post route, at a cost for mail service of $327,966. From that period it has been steadily advancing, until, in the year 1852, there were 20,901 post offices, 214,284 miles of post route, at a cost for mail transit of $4,295,311. For the past year, (1853,) we have 22,788 post offices, 218,743 miles of post route, and $4,989,758 paid by the people for organizing, enlarging, and perfecting this mighty system, which, like the nerves of the human body, is designed to be extended over every part of our country, carrying intelligence from the center to the extremities of the Republic. Is it not universally admitted that intelligence is the vital principle of popular institutions, the current of life that is to sustain them, and renew, in its regular flow, their health and power?

Is not the authority which the Constitution confers for promoting the arts and sciences, and the policy established by the founders of this Government in setting apart a portion of our public domain to the cause of education, an evidence of the importance they attach to the dissemination of knowledge as the mainspring of progress?

The prompt, speedy communication of intelligence is the great desideratum of the age. We seek it, like the diffusive light of day, as an element, not merely of social enjoyment, of mental improvement, but of industrial prosperity.

The telegraphic wires now stretching over the Union, the British Isles, upon the continent of Europe, even reaching Asia and Northern Africa, passing over rivers, and under inland seas, and the millions that are paid for the service, confirm the truth here asserted.

The post horse and country road have yielded to the post coach and turnpike; these to the railway and steam-engine; whilst, in speed of transmission, the Electric power has passed the summit of human expectation, by its triumphs over time and space. Upon what ground can we withhold from California direct means of intercommunication equal to those possessed by her sister States on the Atlantic, when the Constitution declares in its fourth article, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of the several States?"

In view of this constitutional obligation, will you not extend to her a participation in that wonderful system of inland transit and intercourse with her sister States which others enjoy without stint or limitation? Will you leave us, separated and disconnected from you by half a hemisphere, and compel us to seek our ancient homes, and mingle with you only by encountering the privations of an overland journey through an Indian country, or the dangers of the sea in coming around the western and eastern slopes of the North American continent through foreign territory; or in pursuing, for seventeen thousand miles, the watery track around Cape Horn? I have thus considered this subject as part of a

POSTAL SYSTEM, esteemed by every enlightened nation so important to its prosperity, and in which we seek a fair participation. It has been operating in the political transitions of the country, from the Revolution to the present time; and the people of California ask to have extended to them its full benefits, not as a favor, but as a constitutional right. We ask the exercise of no disputed power, such as the construction of a road by the United States Government through the limits of a SOVEREIGN STATE. We leave the extension of the road through California to the State herself, and in addition to compensation for carrying the United States mails, appropriate public land, in limited quantities, and with specified restrictions, in accordance with legislative precedents, well established for nearly a third of a century. It is, in fact, only necessary to consult our statute-books for the last three years, to see the unequalled manner in which this congressional power has been exercised. I refer more especially to the act of Congress, approved September, 1850, to grant "the right of way, AND MAKING A GRANT OF LAND TO THE STATES OF ILLINOIS, MISSISSIPPI, AND ALABAMA, IN AID OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF A RAILROAD FROM CHICAGO TO MOBILE." Also, that of June 10, 1852, "granting the right of way to the State of Missouri, and a PORTION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS TO AID IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN RAILROADS IN SAID STATE;" followed by a general act, approved August 10, 1852, granting "the right of way to all rail and plank roads and macadamized turnpikes through the public lands belonging to the United States." And the act, approved February 9, 1853, "granting the right of way, and making a grant of land to the States of Arkansas and Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point on the Mississippi, opposite the mouth of the Ohio river, via Little Rock, to the Texas boundary, near Fulton, in Arkansas, with branches to Fort Smith and the Mississippi river."

Upon these precedents, and numerous grants of public land to other States of the Union, which, unlike California, have been fostered, nurtured, and sustained by the National Treasury from territorial infancy up to their political majority, and have since received the benefits of large concessions of the richest agricultural lands, we ask of Congress, and have a right to ask, upon the terms of even-handed justice, that our far-off State, exiled by a continent of territorial space, shall be placed upon an equal footing with other States of the Union; and who, in justice, can stand up here and deny us? The bill, it is true, proposes an increase in the number of alternate sections, but not greater in proportion than what is believed to be reasonable, when we consider the low cost of materials and labor, at the great centers and thoroughfares of trade on and near the Mississippi, in contrast with the enormous prices which they command with us, and the expense of transporting equipments to the other side of the continent.

These considerations so fully justify the proposed increase in the quantity of land as to render argument or comment almost unnecessary. It seems, in fact, indispensable, in a relative point of view, if we intend to place California on equal terms with her sister land States, who have been so liberally dealt with by Congress.

In thus leaving the State of California to construct the extension of the Pacific railway through her limits, we avoid infringement of State sovereignty or any constitutional difficulties. The diversity and essential difference of views held on this subject by distinguished statesmen had not escaped attention; but were deliberately considered in framing the bill before you.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER.

We find the opinion has been advanced with great ability, and eminent juridical learning, that the clause in the Constitution respecting "post roads," gave Congress an express, not implied, power; and that the non-exercise of this power, in its full extent, in regard to the construction of "post roads," but merely designating existing State roads as post routes, was not a surrender of the power, and did not exhaust it; but that, under the Constitution, it still exists as a full right, and may be exercised whenever in the judgment of Congress it may be necessary. This construction, however, falls within the reasoning and principles that assert a still larger exercise of congressional interposition in works of internal improvement. Mr. Jefferson, in his annual message of December, 1806, and his successor, Mr. Madison, in his message of December, 1816, denied any such general power in Congress.

President Adams, on the other hand, in his inaugural of the 4th March, 1825, took a contrary view, which sanctioned the principle, and favored expenditures from the National Treasury for such purposes. In 1827, the House of Representatives, by a large majority, voted an appropriation for the continuation of surveys of routes and roads. In 1830, that body took an opposite position, and rejected, by a decided majority, a bill to construct a road from Buffalo to New Orleans; and in that same year President Jackson held that Congress possessed no power, under the Constitution, to construct roads, or vote money for internal improvements of a local character, but admitted that the right to make appropriations for works of a national character had so generally obtained as to warrant its exercise.

In his message of May, 1822, President Monroe examined, with eminent ability, the constitutional provision delegating authority to Congress respecting "post roads." He analyzed the subject by an almost irresistible process of reasoning, and by his construction confined and restricted the power in such a manner as to avoid the slightest trespass upon the rights and jurisdiction of the sovereign States. The power, as thus defined, is held to be the true constitutional doctrine; and, in accordance with it, we propose that California shall make her own portion of the Pacific road, from its junction on her eastern boundary to the ocean; and, make to her a grant of land, in strict and exact obedience to legislative precedents, to aid her in the construction of the same.

"Suppose," said a distinguished jurist who once adorned the supreme bench, that "the State roads do not furnish (as in point of fact they did not at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and as hereafter, for many exigencies of the Government in times of war, and otherwise they may not) suitable routes for the mails, what is then to be done? Is the power of the General Government to be paralyzed?" Such considerations doubtless had their weight with Congress; for in 1806; during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, a law was passed, by which the President was authorized "to cause to be opened a road from the frontier of Georgia, on the route from Athens to New Orleans, till the same intersects the thirty-first degree of north latitude;" and "to cause to be opened a road or roads through the territory, lately ceded by the Indians to the United States, from the river Mississippi to the Ohio, and to the former Indian boundary line which was established by the treaty of Greenville;" and to cause to be "opened a road from Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, to Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory." Here, and in other examples which could be cited, we find Congress expressly requiring the Executive of the General Government to have a road opened even through the limits of a sovereign State; but waiving these precedents, and adhering to the sounder constitutional doctrine, which forbids the exercise of such powers by Congress within the boundaries of a State, the provisions of the bill are so drawn that the strictest constructionist can take no exception to them in this respect.

That there must be an ocean outlet from that immense territory, extending from the Mississippi valley on the east to the Pacific on the west, must be conceded by every member of the Senate.

Is it to be supposed that the active, restless, and enterprising race of men already finding their way for settlement in that direction, and soon to fill it up by millions, with their high capacities of civilization, can be confined in their trade and business of life to expansive prairies and plains, or walled in between the rocks of the Sierra Madre and Sierra Nevada mountains? Does any one imagine that this state of things will be permitted by a race whose history resembles in its progress the restless people who came from the regions of the north of Germany, rushing over the Roman empire, yet with this grand and distinctive difference, that instead of carrying ruin and desolation, they scatter everywhere the seeds of civilization and prosperity, and are sowing them broadcast upon the bosom of the American continent?

In this career of civilization the forest has fallen beneath the ax of the pioneer, and been succeeded first by cabins, then villages, and then cities with their palaces. The water powers of nature that fell in sullen solitude have been trained and directed so as to labor for man as his slave; and plucking life from fire, and breathing it into a grosser element—the solid earth, whether in valley, hill, or mountain—rivers, inland seas, and oceans, are traversed with lightning speed by this new creation of motive power.

Desolation and silence have been waked up from the slumber of centuries, and the busy hum of life, in all its social and political forms, is everywhere heard. Can a race of men with such energies, such capacities, be held in check, or remain indifferent to delay? and why should we not, as legislators, at once meet the exigencies of the age in which we live?

In the discharge of our public duty, we can, as a rule of direction, ever look with confidence to the policy and wisdom of the illustrious founders of the Republic. Let us consult their history when foreign interference attempted to obstruct their natural commercial right of outlet, and see the value they placed upon that right, and the kindred one of unrestricted communication?

Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State under Washington, saw the blight to our prosperity that would result from permitting the Spanish Government to intercept our right of way to the Gulf of Mexico, from our southern boundary, the 31st degree of north latitude, as established under the definitive treaty of 1783.

The instructions he prepared in 1792 for the United States commissioners appointed to negotiate with the court of Spain, respecting the navigation of the Mississippi, demonstrate the comprehensive policy of that great statesman. He not only insisted on this as a right under the treaty of 1763, by which it was yielded to the subjects of England, and passed to us when the political sovereignty changed, but that it was a right based upon broader, and more unquestionable grounds, and that is, on the law of nature and of nations.

If we appeal, said Mr. Jefferson, to the law of nature and of nations, "as we feel it written in the heart of man, what sentiment is written in deeper characters than that the ocean is free to all men, and the rivers to all their inhabitants? Is there a man, savage or civilized, unbiassed by habit, who does not feel and attest this truth? Accordingly, in all tracts of country united under the same political society, we find this natural right invariably acknowledged and protected, by laying the navigable rivers open to all their inhabitants. When they enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream is in any case obstructed, it is an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind."

The difficulties growing out of our controverted right to navigate the Mississippi to the Gulf soon satisfied our statesmen that the question could be more effectually put to rest by acquiring the sovereignty of New Orleans and other dependencies. The agitations and conflicts in Europe had changed the relations which Spain bore to that territory, as she had become supplanted in its sovereignty in virtue of the cession of it by a secret treaty in 1800 to the French Republic.

During the exile of Carnot, he referred, in an answer addressed by him to Bailleul, to a project on foot in the French Directory, to obtain a cession of Louisiana from the Spanish Government.

Hints of the progress of this affair had reached our Minister at the Court of St. James. In June, 1801, Mr. Madison, as Secretary of State, drew the attention of our Minister at Madrid, Mr. Pinkney, to the subject, as one that would "deserve and engage" his "early and vigilant inquiries, and may require a delicate and circumspect management."

In September of that year our Government dispatched instructions to our Minister to France, Mr. Livingston, requiring him, if "the cession from Spain to France" had "irrevocably taken place, or certainly" would "take place, that nothing should be said or done which would unnecessarily irritate our future neighbors, or check the liberality which they may be disposed to exercise in relation to the trade and navigation through the mouth of the Mississippi;" and, in the next place, that efforts should be made to induce France "to make over to the United States the Floridas, if included in the cession to her from Spain, or, at least, West Florida, through which several of our rivers, particularly the Mobile river, empty themselves into the sea."

Among the most remarkable incidents of that day, and in striking contrast with our diplomacy of the present time, is the fact, that whilst our Government at the centre, and its diplomatic agents in Europe, were tracking out the devious involutions of the negotiating Powers respecting the splendid province of Louisiana, and endeavoring to secure the prize, the British Government, as late as May, 1802, had received no intimation whatever, as Lord Hawkesbury stated to our Minister, from the Governments of France or Spain, relative to any convention or treaty for the cession of Louisiana or the Floridas. In the mean time our negotiations had been steadily going on with the French Government, and Congress passed an act, approved the 26th February, 1803, making a provisional appropriation of two millions of dollars, "for the purpose of defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations." On the 17th October, 1803, Mr. Jefferson, at a called session of both Houses, adverted to this appropriation, and announced to Congress that "the enlightened Government of France" had "seen with just discernment the importance to both nations of such liberal arrangements as might best and permanently promote the peace, interest, and friendship of both; and the property and sovereignty of all Louisiana, which had been restored to them" had, "on certain conditions, been transferred to the United States, by instruments bearing date 30th April last;" and that "whilst the property and sovereignty of the Mississippi and its waters became an independent outlet for the produce of the western States, and an uncontrolled navigation through their whole course, free from collision with other Powers, and the dangers to our peace from that source, the fertility of the country, its climate, and extent, promise, in due season, important aids to our Treasury, an ample provision for our posterity, and a wide spread field for the blessings of freedom and equal laws."

While the great measure was in progress to acquire Louisiana for an outlet to the Gulf of Mexico, and before its consummation, Mr. Jefferson had devised a plan for a minute and scientific exploration of the territory of the West, extending from the Mississippi to the Pacific. On the 18th January, 1803, in a communication to Congress, he recommended that an intelligent officer be dispatched with a few men to "explore the whole line, even to the western ocean; have conferences with the natives on the subject of commercial intercourse, get admission among them for our traders as others are admitted, agree on convenient deposits for our interchange of articles, and return with the information required in the course of two summers;" that our nation owed it to their interests to "explore this, the only line of easy communication across the continent, and so directly traversing our own part of it," that "the interests of commerce placed the principal object within the constitutional powers and care of Congress, and that it should incidentally advance the geographical knowledge of our own continent cannot but be an additional gratification."

Congress voted the necessary appropriation, which resulted in the expedition of Lewis and Clarke, who ascended the Missouri to the falls, passed the Rocky Mountains, descended by different streams until they struck the Columbia river, and followed it until they reached the Pacific ocean. All further legislative action on the subject was suspended until the 3d of March, 1853, when Congress passed a law authorizing the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, "to employ such portion of the corps of topographical engineers, and such other persons as he may deem necessary, to make such "explorations and surveys as he may deem advisable, to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean." Thus, after the lapse of half a century since that illustrious patriot originated the project of a Pacific road, Congress waked up to its importance, yet, only by ordering a more thorough and scientific exploration. It is well known to the Senate and the country that I opposed explorations, believing we had information enough of the practicability of several routes, and that I then earnestly urged the passage of a railway bill. Had it been done, it is not doubted that at this time the execution of the great work itself would be under way. Let us for a moment glance at our condition, when, under Mr. Jefferson's administration, the expedition to the western ocean was undertaken, and contrast it with the present, as an evidence of the wisdom and extraordinary foresight and energy of the statesmen of that day.

We were then in political infancy, just entering into the family of nations, having a population of four millions, a defenseless frontier, and unsettled western limits; but not for a moment neglecting the popular interest, they directed the Pacific overland route to be traversed, and that, too, when grappling hand to hand with adroit and practiced diplomacy in the convulsions of Europe, and when every step they took was at the hazard of war.

Now we have a population of twenty-five millions, and are at peace with the world; no open question of boundary, nothing to disturb domestic tranquility, with science, talent, wealth, every means at command. If sound policy dictated its consideration then, does it not command its consummation now? Then our interests were in the beginning of their development, now they are expanded by the growth of fifty years.

That we may have an idea of their present and probable prospective magnitude, I will briefly review our territorial growth from the period of the acknowledgment by Great Britain of our nationality.

By the definitive treaty at Paris, in 1783, recognizing our independence, we had the Atlantic on the east, the highlands, great lakes, and forty-ninth degree parallel on the north, the channel of the Mississippi on the west, and the thirty-first degree of latitude as our southern boundary.

The territorial purchase effected during the administration of Mr. Jefferson gave us the sovereignty of Louisiana, extending our boundaries from the Perdido, embracing the Island of New Orleans, and including the whole country dependent on that river and its tributaries within the limits of its coast, taking at the same time our boundary on the southwest to the Rio Grande, or Rio Bravo del Norte, embracing this territory within the present State of Texas.

By the treaty of 1819 with Spain we acquired East and West Florida; and Texas ceased to be an integral part of the territory of the United States by our taking the Sabine for a boundary; which, extending to Red river, the 100th^o of longitude, along the Arkansas to its source, and thence with the forty-second parallel line of latitude to the Pacific fixed the boundary line between the United States and Spanish dominions. Texas, which had passed from the sovereignty of Spain by revolution in Mexico, having no political affinities with the form of government established in Mexico, detached herself by successful revolution, gallantly maintained her independence, and, as a sovereign State, entered the Confederacy in 1845, under the resolutions of annexation.

By the treaty concluded at Washington, in 1846, between the United States and Great Britain, the disputed sovereignty of Oregon, which had been held in joint occupation under the conventions of 1818 and 1827, the dividing line between the two nations, was established at the 49th parallel of latitude, running to the straits of Fuca, and thence to the Pacific.

By the treaty of 1848 at Guadalupe Hidalgo, between the United States and the Mexican Republic, California and New Mexico were acquired, establishing as our boundary line the Rio Grande on the southwest, the Gila to its junction with the Colorado, and thence near the 32^o of latitude to the Ocean. The Atlantic on the east; the Pacific on the west; the Gulf of Mexico on the south; on the north the Sea, or Straits of Fuca, the 49th parallel of latitude, the great lakes the dividing line under the Ashburton treaty of 1842 to the Atlantic constitute the outline of our present huge dimensions containing three millions two hundred and sixty thousand square miles—nearly equal to all Europe—with a sea-coast of five thousand one hundred and twenty-eight miles, one fifth the circumference of the globe.

I have thus examined this question as a postal measure. Yet other considerations of State more important, because immediate and indispensable, appeal to us in favor of the early completion of the work.

As a MILITARY ROAD, it should engage our attention as a means of protection to our citizens between the Mississippi and the Pacific.

This portion of the Confederacy embraces nearly two millions of square miles, more than three fifths of our territorial extent.

The number of Indians within our limits is estimated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his last annual report, at four hundred thousand, of which eighteen thousand six hundred are located east of the Mississippi; in Minnesota, and along the frontier of the western States to Texas, comprising mostly the emigrated tribes, one hundred and ten thousand; on the plains and Rocky Mountains, and not within any of our organized Territories, sixty-three thousand; in Texas twenty-nine thousand; New Mexico forty-five thousand; Utah twelve thousand; Oregon and Washington twenty-three thousand; and in California one hundred thousand.

The contemplated railway would enable the Government to wield its military power with extraordinary rapidity and economy, and keep in check the dangerous and warlike tribes that roam along the foot of the Rocky and Nevada Mountains; would reduce the public expenditures for the transportation of troops and military supplies, diminish the number and cost of Indian and other agencies, and dispense with a host of officers which it is to be apprehended, when so far beyond the immediate surveillance of authority, would result in speculation, if not speculation and corruption.

Not only is it important in keeping the Indians in check, and preventing tragic scenes, like Gannon's and others, and affording that protection, which, as a Government, we are bound to extend to the settlers who are seeking their way for homes in this great interior region; but in case of foreign war the subject is presented to us in such a form, as it seems to me, can leave no doubt or excuse for delay.

The Constitution of the United States was adopted by the people "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare," and its perpetuity is provided for in its own declared intention of securing the "blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Here is the indefeasible estate, and the distinct path of duty marked out to us. The measure before us is one emphatically required at your hands by those significant terms. By accomplishing it, foreign fleets and armies will in vain assail us upon the Pacific or Atlantic. From ocean to ocean this new means of communication will carry our troops and munitions of war, and enable us, by rapidity of overland communication, to use the military power with such celerity as to defy successful invasion from any quarter. The Commander-in-Chief at Washington could issue his orders, and move his armies with as much dispatch, from this to the other side of the continent, as did the great Emperor in the field of his extensive operations during the wars of the first French revolution. Indeed, it would do more to preserve peace with nations, more to protect us from European interference or aggression, than our Army, Navy, and fortifications combined, useful and necessary though they be. For these you have already expended upwards of $500,000,000 since the Government was founded, and are increasing your expenditures upon them every year, although they consume instead of increase your wealth and products. But this railway, whilst it would secure you against war, or render you impregnable in the event of a collision with foreign nations, would augment your means and resources every year. In case of war, how are you without it to defend California and Oregon? Where is your Navy by which to accomplish such a purpose? Where are your transports, or how would they reach their destination? How would you carry troops, munitions, or supplies, over the mountains and desert that separate the Pacific from the Mississippi?

One of the great objects, most prominent among the powers conferred on the General Government, is the defense of our territory. This was not only a power conferred, but a duty imposed, which you cannot execute, so far as your Pacific possessions are concerned, without this railway. We are separated from you in peace, and in war you leave us at the mercy of any great naval or military Power.

In the event of hostilities with Great Britain, France, or Russia, with our immense ocean frontier, and hostile savages in our midst, from which our policy has nearly relieved every other State but California and Texas, and without naval or coast defense, what would be our fate? Who could estimate the ruin and desolation which would ensue from our isolated and disjointed position? But with such a road as the bill contemplates, and such an increase in the Army as would be proper for a war footing, and the coöperation of that standing army of two millions of freemen—the militia of the Union—which costs the Government nothing, we will stand prepared, at the shortest warning, to defend our soil and repel any aggressor. But without it, even if an oceanic communication should be effected, pursuant to the explorations now going on by American, British, and French officers, the guns of a powerful naval antagonist would command that point and intercept our passage.

The Island of Cuba, which controls both outlets of the Gulf of Mexico, unless it becomes a part of our territory, as appears to be its natural destiny, would, in the hands of an enemy, intercept our transit to the Pacific, and be a point from which could be inflicted upon the whole country the deepest wounds.

Let us consider the diversified and growing interests of our constituents, who throng every avenue of human industry, and then judge of this measure in a COMMERCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

The earth, in its fertility, in every variety of soil and climate, yields its treasures under the steady and thrifty management of our agriculturists, pouring forth hundreds of millions of its annual surplus over our wants. Our manufactories, filled with the products of all the useful and elegant arts, are ever improving under the inventive genius and taste of our people, to which there is no precedent in any age.

Look at Europe in her high state of refinement and wonderful advance in the arts of life, and see the efforts she has made to secure the best markets of the world. Let it be remembered that commerce is always an enriching, civilizing element, and that it led the nations of Europe to the establishment of colonies in the western and eastern hemispheres, by which they at once secured an immense monopoly of trade.

"Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation," said Mr. Jefferson, "are the four pillars of our prosperity."

The framers of the Constitution saw the inefficiency of the articles of Confederation in this respect, and that undoubtedly was one of the primary causes that led to the adoption of our present form of government, which confers upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." No delegation of authority was more indispensable to our prosperity and greatness. From a monetary paralysis in which we were left at the close of the revolutionary war, the nation rose in vigor and wealth, and the whole face of our relations, internal and foreign, underwent an extraordinary change.

A forcible and elegant writer upon public law has said, "the end of the law of nations is the happiness and perfection of mankind;" that "they ought to cultivate a free intercourse for commercial purposes in order to supply each other's wants, and promote each other's prosperity;" that "the variety of climates and productions on the surface of the globe, and the facility of communicating by means of rivers, lakes, and the ocean, invite to a liberal commerce, as agreeable to the law of nature, and extremely conducive to national amity, industry, and happiness;" and that "the numerous wants of civilized life can only be supplied by mutual exchange between nations of the productions of each."

In the infancy of our national existence we struggled against every infringement of our right to traverse the ocean unobstructed, as the common property of man, and resisted any interference with the lawful pursuits of commerce.

The wars of the French revolution brought us into conflict with the principal belligerents. In vindicating our dignity we suspended commercial intercourse with the European Powers, and closed the ports of the Union, by the embargo law, in 1807. For continued aggressions, we engaged in war a second time with England, and rallied the whole energies of the Government in defense of the honor of our flag and its absolute immunity. The great statesmen who have been successively charged with the management of our foreign relations have ever fearlessly maintained and defended our maritime rights.

As candidates for a full share of the trade of the world, we have demanded participation, and we have participated in settling the principles of public laws, which, according to our construction, looks to an enlargement and enfranchisement of commercial intercourse, and the freest competition.

The claim set up by the Portuguese at the zenith of their power in the East Indies, to exclude all Europe from participation in the trade of Asia, of which for a century they once held the entire monopoly, is pronounced by Vattel, "as in violation of the laws of nations, and just cause for war." Our own Government met and rebuked, in 1822, the pretensions of Russia in setting up a claim to the 51st degree of north latitude on the northwest coast of America, and with it a correlative pretension to "prohibit foreign vessels from approaching the northwest coast of America belonging to Russia, within the distance of at least one hundred Italian miles." This claim was further coupled with the pretension, that as the Russian possessions on the Pacific ocean also embraced the opposite side of Asia, and the islands adjacent from Behring's Straits to the 45th degree of latitude, that Government might feel authorized "to exercise upon this sea the right of sovereignty, and especially that of entirely interdicting the entrance of foreigners." Mr. John Q. Adams, then Secretary of State, in his answer of 30th March, 1822, informed the Russian Envoy that "from the period of the existence of the United States as an independent nation, their vessels have freely navigated those seas," and that "the right to navigate them is a part of that independence," and not only so, but, advancing beyond that position, Mr. Adams informed him that "the rights of the citizens of the United States to hold commerce with the aboriginal natives of the northwest coast of America, without the territorial jurisdiction of other nations, even in arms and munitions of war, is as clear and indisputable as that of navigating the seas."

The diplomacy of our Government from the beginning has steadily asserted and maintained our claim to that high position which we now hold as a maritime Power. The right of search, with all its odious correlatives, is virtually ended, so far as the United States are concerned. Great Britain has received decisive notice of the fixed determination of our Government on this point. Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State, in his correspondence with Lord Ashburton, in 1842, denounced it as a practice "founded on principles which we did not recognize, and is invariably attended by consequences so unjust, so injurious, of such formidable magnitude, as cannot be submitted to;" that "the distinguished person to whose hands were first intrusted the seals of" our State Department, declared that "the simplest rule will be that the vessel, being American, shall be the evidence that the seamen on board are such;" that fifty years' experience, and other considerations, had "fully convinced this Government that it is not only the simplest and best, but the only rule which can be adopted and observed consistently with the rights and honor of the United States, and the safety of their citizens; that rule announces, therefore, what will hereafter be the principle maintained by this Government." "In every regularly documented American merchant vessel the crew who navigate it will find their protection in the flag which is over them."

Such is the proud position we now hold as a commercial people, seeking markets throughout the world, and attaining supremacy in this respect, from the abundance and value of our commodities, and the cheapness with which we are willing to supply them, by our shorter and more direct means of communication.

During the wars of Napoleon, England exerted all the powers of her empire to strike the most formidable blows against that system of the French Emperor which shut her out from the markets of the continent. We have no such enemy in the field to intercept our pathway to commercial greatness and power. We want the Pacific railway as a great inland communication, essential to our prosperity. Individual enterprise, fostered by State legislation, has already constructed more than 15,000 miles of railroad all over the Atlantic coast and Mississippi valley, at a cost of more than $500,000,000. These run in almost every imaginable direction, radiating from every considerable point in the Union, and bending in such diversified directions as to make them susceptible of a junction with the great continental track contemplated in this bill, at whatever point it may be commenced. The importance and value of our home trade is estimated at over $500,000,000 annually, and its prospective increase is beyond estimate. The population of the Union is now twenty-five millions. It will be fifty millions in a quarter of a century, by the natural law of increase, and the steady flow of immigration. Within the limits of this immense region of public domain, lying between the Mississippi and the Pacific, if this bill becomes a law, the greater portion of this increase of population, in the twenty-five years that are to come, will, in all probability, establish their homes. It will form a great base line of connection which, in time, will be intersected in every direction by individual enterprise and capital, resembling the railway web that now stretches far and wide over the Atlantic States. Citizens in remote parts of the Republic will no longer be aliens by reason of distance and natural obstacles separating and dividing them, and which we now seek to overcome.

The laws of contact and association, like those which give to man, as an individual, the full play of his sympathies, his attachments, and moral powers, will bind society together in all its parts. They will widen in their effects from the family circle to Cities, Counties, and States, and will be coextensive with the boundaries which embrace the American family.

They will unite and bind the whole together as one great moral being, whose purposes and energies will be directed in the noble cause of progress and civilization.

The object of Columbus in his exploration over the then Western Ocean, was to seek a direct route to India. On his last voyage he arrived at the Isthmus. His successors went beyond it, reaching the Pacific Ocean; and Cortez, ever alive to the importance of carrying out the expansive commercial policy of his nation, by seeking a more direct route to Asia, sought and obtained from Montezuma, and dispatched to his sovereign, Charles V., a chart of that part of the Mexican coast, embracing the river Coatzacoalcas, the natural and political boundary between the present departments of Vera Cruz and Tabasco, and watering that region now known as the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The sagacity of that great but bloodthirsty conqueror saw the necessity of an interoceanic communication, and that the interests of European trade, overcoming all obstacles, would in time open a passage from ocean to ocean. And now, after the lapse of three hundred and thirty-four years since he declared this measure as essential to trade, we find a railroad nearly completed across the Isthmus of Panama, whilst the three great maritime Powers, the United States, England, and France, are engaged in an exploration in that region, as preliminary to a consummation of the project of a ship canal, which had been entertained at a period almost coeval with the discovery of our continent.

The trade of India, centuries before the Christian era, had attracted the attention of the nations of the earth, and in every age from the opening of traffic between the East and the West, it imparted its enriching and civilizing influence to those nations which enjoyed it.

The ancients who dwelt on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, on the northern coast of Africa, and on the Red sea, at the dawn of social organization, showed their appreciation of the purpose for which nature had provided her rivers and arms of the sea and the ocean.

The earliest commercial intercourse commenced in the Mediterranean and in the Arabian Gulf, which laid open the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa. The Phenicians and Egyptians found means to navigate those waters, and soon a commercial spirit extended from the West, reached the Indies, that land bearing its name from the supposed indefiniteness of its extent, and in every age rich in spices, tropical commodities, in pearls, diamonds, and silks, and all that can add to the luxury and refinement of the human family. The Phenicians, inhabiting a small strip on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, embracing the sites of Tyre and Sidon, have left a record in the sacred Book, of what commerce did for them, in which they are mentioned as the "merchants of Tyre, princes, and her traffickers, the honorable of the earth." Their trade extended from the Mediterranean to harbors at the extremity of the Red Sea or Arabian Gulf, where it debouches into the Arabian Sea, and from thence they worked their way until they reached the shores of India. From their harbors, near the present straits of Babelmandel, they also traded with the coast of Africa. Their commodities from the East were brought up the Arabian Gulf, and thence by overland carriage, transported to the nearest port on the Mediterranean, from which, by water, they were taken to Tyre, and distributed over the ancient world. It is the province of the historian, and not the political economist, to trace the expeditions of Darius and Alexander, who reached the Indus, and sent back such glowing accounts of the riches and fertility of the East. Yet it will not escape the notice of the most casual inquirer what importance the great Macedonian conqueror attached to the trade of the East, from the efforts he made to monopolize and wrest it from the Tyreans. After conquering Egypt he established at one of the mouths of the Nile, as a preferable site to that of the merchants of Tyre, the city of Alexandria, which became the entrepôt of commerce with India, for eighteen hundred years.

He examined the course of the Euphrates and Tigris, directed the catamaras that obstructed them to be removed, in order that the commodities of the East might be carried through the Persian Gulf, and up those rivers, for distribution in the interior of his Asiatic dominions, whilst a portion of the Eastern trade would pass through the Arabian Gulf, as the other channel by which it would reach Alexandria, and thence find its way to the remainder of the known world.

In the rise and fall of kingdoms, and until the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, the eastern trade had been regarded as an unfailling source of wealth and power. The extension of Mohammedanism over western Asia broke off all direct commercial intercourse between Europe and India, and the commerce of the East then reached the shores of the Mediterranean only by means of caravans.

At the close of the fifteenth century Europe began to arouse from the commercial lethargy of the middle ages; and, quickened into life by the interchange of social elements in the wars of the crusaders, a gradual and progressive change came over the Governments of that continent, and the spirit of inquiry and exploration was renewed. Yet the smallest kingdom in Europe led the way in that maritime career which changed the relations of nations and began a new era in civilization.

At the dawn of the fifteenth century, the Portuguese timidly adventuring along the northwestern shores of Africa, were driven out by a tempest to a small island adjacent to Madeira, and thence continuing their explorations by bolder enterprises, they discovered that the African continent contracted towards the east. The reigning monarch of Portugal, six years before Columbus left Spain, dispatched Diaz on a further exploration, with the object steadily in view of discovering a route to India. The Portuguese navigator reached the high promontory which forms the southern boundary of Africa, and there terminated his voyage.

The success of the discoveries in the West by the Spaniards had electrified Europe; and Emanuel, who had succeeded to the crown of Portugal, eagerly pursued the great purpose of effecting a passage by the Cape of Good Hope to the Indies, which was finally realized by the expedition of Vasco de Gama. He doubled the cape, reached the city of Melinda, on the eastern coast of Africa, near the equator, in whose harbor he found vessels trading from India, and thence pursuing his course arrived at the Malabar coast, on the Indian peninsula, where the barbarism of Africa disappeared, and the active elements of commerce were in operation.

At this period the commercial prosperity of Portugal was founded, and for a century it was at the summit of its grandeur. From Malacca, which they had seized midway between the western and eastern confines of Asia, they opened trade on the west with the merchants of Malabar, Ceylon, Coromandel, and Bengal, and on the east with China, Japan, the Indian Archipelago, and other portions of the Asiatic continent.

The Italian States of Genoa and Venice had risen in the middle ages to commercial wealth and power. Their maritime importance had been increased by the transit of troops and supplies in the wars of the crusaders and the interchanges that took place. Their trade extending to the shores of the Black Sea and the Persian Gulf brought back to Western Europe the products of the East.

The Venetians, seeing at once the ruin of their commercial prosperity by the new route, sought an alliance with the Soldan of the Mamelukes, who threatened the King of Portugal and the sovereign Pontiff with the death of all Christians in his dominions unless the new route was abandoned. He fitted out a squadron in the Red Sea, and, with the cooperation of the Venetians, attempted to intercept and destroy the Portuguese. This union of the discordant elements of Christianity and Mohammedanism to avert the fatal consequences to their prosperity in trade, resulted in ruin to them. The scepter had departed. The Soldan's fleet perished in the conflict, and the Portuguese remained masters of the India seas. The facilities of the new route enabled them to undersell all competitors, dislodge and put down all competition, and the full tide of commerce, flowing to the cheapest market, carried with it all the elements of prosperity.

The Dutch, as an energetic, trading people, sought India products in the great commercial market of Lisbon; but the harbor of the Portuguese capital was closed against them. They then unsuccessfully sought a new route by the northern seas to avoid collision; but finally, towards the close of the sixteenth century, they entered the India seas and laid the foundation of their commercial power in the east by settlement at Java, and on the islands of Nangasacki, which they hold to this day, having driven the Portuguese from the Moluccas, Japan, Malacca, and Ceylon. France and England also became competitors for this trade; the latter, arousing from the domestic discord and lassitude in which the contest between the houses of York and Lancaster had left her, began a commercial career at the commencement of the seventeenth century, when Queen Elizabeth conferred, for a limited period, upon an association of merchants in London the exclusive right of the commerce of India. With the usual energy of that extraordinary nation, now our great commercial rival, we see her, upon her entrance into this new field of trade and wealth, founding settlements upon the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, forming establishments at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, and obtaining the control of the commerce in gold stuffs, carpets, and silks. Great Britain pursued her conquests down to modern times, when political tempests shook to its foundation the colonial system of Europe, and soon brought within her capacious sweep nearly the whole of the commercial establishments of the East. There she stands now, in all the plenitude of her power, ruling, directly or indirectly, in the East, one hundred and twenty-seven millions of people. The wealth which she has poured in upon the British Isles from the East is beyond estimate. It has made the seat of her power a city of palaces, and adorned its inhabitants with a profusion of wealth and luxury to which there is no parallel in the history of the world. It has covered the ocean with her fleets—consolidated the national power, so that, whilst she defied the continent of Europe in arms, it has given that strength by which she has hitherto been able to keep unbroken

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 56.

the chain that binds her numerous colonies, dotted around the great circle of the earth, and on which the sun never sets. It has given her means by which representatives of her strength are placed upon every sea to assert her power, and defend her interests. Not only so, but she has done all that a nation could do to bring herself in the most direct communication with the great bulk of her Asiatic possessions. As shown by me in discussing this subject during the last session of Congress,—and its importance justifies a repetition,—she has established no less than three overland routes to India, one from Southampton down the English channel across the Bay of Biscay, along the coast of Portugal and Spain to Gibraltar, thence through the Mediterranean, along the northern coast of Africa to Algiers, Malta, and Alexandria, Cairo, and across the Isthmus of Suez, from which, descending the Red Sea and through its straits at the southern extremity, the route lies across the Indian ocean to Point de Galle in Ceylon, and from thence branching across the Bay of Bengal down the straits of Malacca to Singapore, and up the China sea to Hong Kong. From the same point in Ceylon there are steam communications on the western side of Hindostan, and along the Malabar coast to Bombay, whilst on the eastern side there is a like communication to Madras and Calcutta.

There is then another route connecting with this, from London, by the way of Folkstone, Boulogne, Paris, Marseilles, and Malta, to Alexandria. Then they have a German overland route connecting with the first by way of the Elbe, Leipzig, Dresden, Vienna, Trieste, and down the Adriatic, by the Ionian Islands, to Alexandria. There is another and still shorter route, which has engaged attention, and is proposed, being the same by which the troops of Alexander the Great returned from the Indies, by the Persian Gulf and river Euphrates to Bassorah, at the head of the Persian Gulf, upon which the passage from Bombay to the Mediterranean can be made in twelve days. She also proposes to connect the British East India possessions by steam navigation from Ceylon or Singapore to the Australian settlements.

But, as if not content with all these facilities, another stupendous scheme for a more direct and speedy communication with the East by railway has been contemplated, by which London and Calcutta, the capitals of the western and eastern worlds, will be brought within a week's journey of each other. The proposed route is from Calais to Ostend, thence to Cologne, through Augsburg, Lombardy to Trieste on the Adriatic, thence along the valleys of European Turkey to Bassorah on the Persian Gulf, passing along the northern shores of that gulf through Persia and Beloochistan to the Indus, and thence to Calcutta, on the eastern coast of Hindostan. This route from London to the capital of the Bengal Presidency would be about five thousand six hundred miles in length, and, it is supposed, can be constructed in fourteen years.

Look at the measure before the Senate in contrast with what England has done to further her commercial interests, and will any one say that our Government is not as capable of extending equal benefits to our people as Great Britain is to hers? The beauty and perfection of our institutions consist in their eminent capacity for good and its general diffusion; and, under enlightened popular control, this Government cannot long be misdirected, nor remain quiescent or inactive when the public interest demands its interposition.

No Senator can say that the measure is not one of the highest concern to our present interests and our future prosperity, if indeed it is not indispensable to prevent territorial dismemberment.

Have the people of the United States no claims upon their Government? Shall we sit here listlessly with arms folded, virtually denying them? Or shall sectional jealousy, that destructive cancer of national happiness, be suffered to paralyze and destroy our energies and usefulness, or wire-drawn political theories of power, defeat this important object!

There is a point of time in the dealings of men with each other, when "forbearance ceases to be a virtue." So with the public mind aroused on a question of momentous importance, when every public man is held to a just responsibility. Recognizing that responsibility, how will we stand justified before our constituents, if, by failure now in the discharge of duty, we permit a continuance of the trade of the world through foreign channels, when it is in our power to bring it under the control of our own people, whose industry and enterprise have set afloat upon our waters and and upon the ocean more than eighteen thousand vessels, with nearly half a million of tonnage.

We ask in the name of our trade, domestic and foreign, that a direct means of communication be given through our own territory. The geographical center of the Republic is almost unoccupied and uncultivated for want of the road we now seek. Intersect it as speedily as you please by an indefinite number of highways when the public interest and business of the country require them, but give us now one railroad as a practical measure to begin with, and the settlement of the country will speedily be accomplished, the foundation laid for the building of many roads connecting this with all parts of the Union. For all postal, military and commercial purposes, the intervening territory between the Mississippi and Pacific now presents an impassable barrier, forcing all our intercourse through foreign territory, and placing California at a distance of seven thousand miles from New York—the time occupied in making the transit being more than double that required for European communication; whilst Egypt and Turkey may be reached sooner than our Pacific possessions. There, too, we can go by an uninterrupted voyage under our own national flag. But in going to, or returning from the Pacific, we are indebted to the courtesy of foreign Powers for the privilege of a passage, unless we undertake the voyage by Cape Horn, which we might be fortunate enough to accomplish in between two and three months, by steam, or from four to six months in the ordinary sail navigation.

That such a state of things can long continue, either in peace or war, is impossible.

California now points you the way to the commerce of Asia, and to secure it she asks a continental railroad, not only for her own use, but for the benefit of all, yet appealing to you in virtue of the high claims she has upon you. Already she has more than doubled your metallic capital, in pouring her golden treasures into the lap of the Union. Hold back for a single quarter of a year her returns to the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, and another commercial panic will involve you in speedy bankruptcy. Your stocks will fall, property will decline in value, banks perish; industry, agriculture, navigation, and manufactures will be prostrated. Go where you will, and your money, coined from her gold, will be found in every dwelling, the lowly cabin as well as the lordly mansion, in all the States and Territories. Everywhere it has stimulated your industry, and given to labor increased employment and more ample reward. What has it done for the commerce of the country and your National Treasury? It has doubled your exports, and nearly tripled your receipts.

Look at results. Twenty-three millions of revenue from duties in 1846—nearly seventy millions from the same source in 1854. Who doubts that, with the enlarged commerce growing out of a more liberal policy, this incredible increase of revenue is mainly attributable to the yearly supply of California gold? No merchant, manufacturer, banker, or statesman of any party, will controvert this. Your receipts from customs and the sale of your public lands are increased from this swell in the volume of currency. Forty millions in the aggregate increase of your annual revenue from lands and customs are the consequence. Yet you hesitate about a reasonable appropriation—the effect of which will be to multiply a hundred fold your revenues and sources of wealth.

Is this wise, just, or expedient? California furnishes the element of national prosperity in peace, and the sinews of war. Yet for the want of this road you keep her in distant and dangerous isolation.

The people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes and the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, demand this measure. They look to Congress during this session to lay the foundation or its commencement. If we accomplish the object, it will be in vain for Great Britain, in her efforts to maintain commercial supremacy, to carry out her scheme of a great continental railway from Halifax through British territory to the Pacific, now so warmly advocated by many of her statesmen and engineers, or to undertake her Asiatic railway from the Mediterranean, by the Persian Gulf and India, to the ports of China.

But if local jealousies or sectional prejudices should defeat our present action, she will arise with renewed vigor to the prosecution of these great works, and new avenues of trade will secure to her the undisputed command of the commerce of the world. It is a question between London and New York, between Calcutta and San Francisco, between England and America, by land and sea for the supremacy; and we surrender it, without an effort, to our great rival, if we now fail in the performance of duty.

Do not defeat this bill by any illiberal, parsimonious policy, which would provide means inadequate to the undertaking, and subject it to sneers, as theoretical, inefficient, and leave it a dead letter on the statute-book; nor embarrass it by throwing the apple of discord among us in regard to different routes; nor weigh it down by overloading it in the form of several projected routes at a time, as if one was not stupendous enough to engage all our energies, until population, the increase of trade and commerce in this new channel, had so far advanced as to show their necessity. No intelligent business man ever intentionally met a demand by a redundant supply; but, on the contrary, the latter is always regulated by the former. This is a too well established doctrine of political economy to be denied. The foundation and growth of cities and of nations, ancient and modern, rest upon it. On this same principle, within the present half century, steam navigation and the railway began with us—the one with a single vessel, the other with a single route. Now more than three thousand steam vessels float upon American waters alone; and our lines of railway are equal in length to two thirds the circumference of the globe. We run no risk from the very outset of monopoly or imposition in the construction of a single route, for already we have our splendid clipper ships making quick passages around Cape Horn, and our steam routes by the Isthmus to the Pacific, which will be uninterrupted in time of peace, and afford an active and healthy competition, making it an object with all concerned to cheapen the tolls of their several routes.

In seeking the Asiatic, and especially the Chinese trade, which has been coveted by every civilized nation that has preceded us as a source of affluence, we resort, not like our great commercial rival, to the strong arm of power, to coerce a trade in poison to the amount of twenty-five millions of dollars annually, but to deal with them by an interchange of commodities for the benefit of all. Since the war between Great Britain and China, in 1842, which resulted in opening the five ports to foreign trade, our commerce has rapidly increased, until now it reaches annually from sixteen to seventeen millions of dollars, employing two hundred vessels. Who can estimate its increase and effects upon our ship-yards, and the business of our commercial cities and depôts throughout the country, if this bill should become a law?

Our recent acquisitions on the Pacific have revolutionized our commercial relations with the world—what to ancient, and even to modern Europe, was "India beyond the Ganges" is "India within the Ganges" to us. In creating this new route, more important to us than the Portuguese discovery of the route around the Cape of Good Hope was to them, the question of maritime ascendancy will no longer be in doubt. The trade of Asia and the Indies will pass over it through the center of the North American continent, and its stimulating influence in settlements, not only along the route, but spreading all over the vast region between the Mississippi and the Pacific, will be incalculable; whilst its enriching benefits will pervade and invigorate every department of the social system, and impart a strength and power to our Government that will defy all opposition or resistance.

I have thus briefly and most imperfectly referred to the commercial considerations which commend the subject to our attention. If time were allowed to enforce them, a picture could be presented of the greatness and glory of the Republic, the result of these vast commercial advantages, to which no legislator could shut his eyes.

Napoleon, when no longer the Emperor, but the philosophic statesman and dispassionate observer at St. Helena, discoursing upon the purposes of Government, and in special reference to our country, said: "Look at the United States, where, without any apparent force or effort, everything goes on prosperously; every one is happy and contented; and this is because the public wishes and interest are, in fact, the ruling power." "Place the Government," said he, "at variance with the will and interest of its inhabitants," and then, as he contemplated such an event, he drew a picture of the mischief that would follow.

This measure is one not only involving the diversified interests, which I have presented to the Senate, but requires to be examined as to its POLITICAL EFFECT UPON THE COUNTRY.

The duty imposed upon us to maintain and preserve our territory in its utmost extent, is not to be denied. No man will confront the American people, hesitating or intimating a doubt on this point. Our institutions, in their very nature, are expansive and progressive. The Pacific coast and important Islands of Polynesia, have at different times been the object of desire and envy of European States. Captain Beechy, of the royal navy, examined the port of San Francisco, and reported it to be of immense compass, "sufficiently extensive to contain all the British Navy," having excellent harbors and anchorages, and surrounded by a country varied by hills and valleys. In 1840, the British captain, Belcher, was also charged with the careful examination of the harbor; and at the same time the Hudson's Bay Company, relying on the support of the British Government, stretched her line of forts towards this territory, in the hope that negotiations which had been commenced in London for a cession of Mexican territory in satisfaction of the English debt would result in the acquisition of California. The views of England respecting the Sandwich Islands have been well known. In 1788 Captain Meares, of the English Navy, did not hesitate to declare that the inhabitants of those Islands would, one day, be ranked among British subjects. In the year 1843, under the pretext of redress of grievances, and the prosecution of existing claims, Lord Paulet took possession of these Islands. The energetic interposition of our Government resulted in the disavowal of the act by Lord Aberdeen, as communicated by the British Envoy, Mr. Fox, to Mr. Upshur, our Secretary of State; and the British Commodore, Thomas, hauled down the British flag in the summer of the same year, and restored King Kehama the Third to all his functions.

The importance of the Sandwich Islands as intermediate points between the Russian Asiatic and Russian American possessions attracted, in 1812, the attention of the Imperial Company of St. Petersburg. In that year, Baranoff, the governor of Russian America, founded a settlement at the port of Bodega, on the Californian coast, and sent a ship to Honolulu to establish a factory. In 1814 he renewed his efforts to open commercial relations, and repeatedly afterwards; but his attempts were discouraged, and finally proved abortive.

The port of San Francisco has ever been regarded as the key to the northwest coast of America and the Pacific ocean.

"The future of these Islands," says a profound observer once connected with the French Legation in Mexico, "is ultimately bound to that of California; and the nation which will become the mistress of the one ought to possess the other; they seem, in fact, designed as a rallying point for vessels of every description that furrow the Pacific ocean north of the equator, placed, as they are, between California, the contested Territory of Oregon, the northwest coast, Russian America, and the numerous archipelagoes of the great ocean and of Asia." These Islands, it will be remembered, lie in a direct line, or nearly so, between San Francisco and Hong Kong, and in the 20th degree of north latitude, being the parallel of the Island of Cuba.

During the last forty years, our Government reflecting the public will, has been alive to the importance of commercial position and ascendancy on the Pacific. So impressed with this fact was the Spanish Minister at Washington, that in a dispatch of the 1st April, 1812, to the Viceroy of Mexico, he forewarned that functionary to be on his guard and arm the frontiers, as the Government of the United States proposed to fix its limits at the mouth of the Rio Bravo del Norte, and ascend to the 31st degree of latitude, and then draw a line direct to the Pacific, which would bring Upper California into the American Union.

During the presidency of General Jackson, Mr. Forsyth, in his dispatch of the 6th August, 1835, to the United States Chargé d'Affaires in Mexico, instructed him to treat for a line that would give us the harbor of San Francisco, with an offer of five millions for it; and Mr. Calhoun, as Secretary of State, sent, in 1844, a secret messenger to the President of Mexico, with an offer of ten millions for this harbor. The sequel of public events which finally led to our acquisitions on the Pacific are before the world.

Recent negotiations foreshadow, and the law of political affinity seems to indicate the period as not far distant when Sonora and Lower California, with an aggregate area of over two hundred thousand square miles, and two thousand nine hundred of sea coast around the peninsula and along the main land, will be embraced within the boundary of the Union.

The obligation upon the political departments, in the exercise of legislative powers to bind together this nation, is a solemn and paramount obligation. This measure appeals to us in this point of view, and from the responsibility of neglect, indifference, or delay, we cannot escape before the tribunal of public opinion.

If California were some distant, dreary region, like the Orkney or Shetland Islands in the mist of the Northern Ocean, or some barren strip of land, unfit for culture, and shut out from commerce, still, as a part of the territory of the Union, your political power must reach it.

The principle established by those who founded and matured the institutions they have bequeathed to us as a sacred trust, and for which they staked their fame forever, was, that not an inch of the territory of the Republic should be disintegrated or dissevered. For this, the mistress of the world battled in the days of her glory, and maintained it until she sank under an accumulation of social disorders, and the wounds which misgovernment had inflicted. It was to maintain this principle, that induced Washington, amidst thickening misfortune, to declare that he would never give up the contest for the independence of the united colonies, or the territory they claimed, even if driven to the fastnesses of the Alleghany mountains.

If there was nothing attractive in our Pacific possessions, and they were valueless in all that makes the earth valuable to man, yet as a part of our territory, you are bound to defend them. But in contrast with sterility, or even the fairer portions of our other States, what a picture does California present! Look at her in her immense proportions, stretched out on the shores of the western ocean, with a line of sea shore equal to one half of the whole extent of the Atlantic coast, and an area of one hundred and eighty-eight thousand nine hundred and eighty-one square miles, equal to one hundred and twenty millions, nine hundred and forty seven thousand, eight hundred and forty acres—more than four times the area of the State of New York; and capable, from her commercial position, and agricultural and mineral resources, of maintaining a population equal to that now held by the whole American Union. With the coast range of mountains, in its beautiful undulations from lofty summits to irregular hills on the west, and the snowy mountains and Colorado river on the east, and Lower California on the south its center intersected by the rivers Sacramento and San Joaquin, whose magnificent valleys alone contain millions of acres of the most fertile soil, stretching near the entire length of the State, each flowing a distance of some three or four hundred miles in contrary directions from the north and from the south, and uniting in the same estuary to discharge their waters into the bay of San Francisco, dug out, as it were, by the hand of nature herself, for the noblest of human purposes.

Here we have a harbor and port, the natural receptacle of the produce of our extensive valleys, and at no distant day to be the Pacific seat of trade, and an equipoise to the Atlantic emporium. It will be the entrepôt and storehouse to which the coasts of the Western ocean, of Northwestern America, and of the Asiatic regions, will send their products. From this common center of trade will be furnished in exchange the grain and other of our products required for subsistence by the people of the Southwestern coast, of the Mexican and Central American States, down to the equator, to Peru, to the Southwestern coast of Asia and islands of the Polynesian group. The serenity and mildness of our climate, the mammoth growth of our vegetation, the capacity of our soil for wheat and the smaller grains, extending its adaptation also to the vine, give advantages not surpassed, if equaled, within the limits of any one of the States of the Union. A few short years ago she was held by a sparse and apathetic population of some few thousand souls, with limited wants, and these almost supplied spontaneously by nature. From the moment the American flag rose upon her hills the scene was changed. Western settlers entered her limits, those pioneers whose strong hands and patriotic hearts have everywhere laid the deep foundations of our prosperity. Apathy in California ceased, and was succeeded by the activity of industrial pursuits. The golden discoveries were first made in seeing a few glittering particles sparkling in the sunlight in a mill-race on a fork of the American river, a tributary of the Sacramento. This discovery was followed up in our rivers, which, rushing from the Nevada chain, liberate and sweep down to their beds the hidden treasure, and point the way to the sources of mineral wealth, hitherto illimitable in extent, and exhibiting no signs of exhaustion. The opening, expanding veins of our rocky structure have been reached, and their golden deposits unfolded by the ingenuity and enterprise of that indomitable band of immigrants, whose tireless energies mock at all difficulties, and defy all obstacles. The rush of immigration extended, energy and enterprise flocked to our shores. Labor, that makes man what he is, and without which gold is as valueless as the dust of the earth, did its work. Industry, that "intangible, abstract commodity," directed our energies, and we rose in the full proportions of a sovereign State, unprecedented in growth, and unexampled in its career in the history of nations.

Her mineral discoveries, which the press had announced from one end of the globe to the other, until the news even penetrated the isolation of the Chinese dominions, were first looked upon as oriental fictions, then doubted, then believed, and finally realized beyond all anticipation.

In 1820 we had a metallic currency in the United States, according to Mr. Gallatin's report in that year, of thirty-two millions five hundred thousand dollars. The products of all the mines in the Union, from that year until 1848, furnished an additional sum of twelve millions seven hundred and forty-one thousand six hundred and forty-seven dollars, being an average annual yield of between four and five hundred thousand dollars. Our net specie imports over our exports for that period were eighty-two millions eighty-six thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars, and immigrant supplies, at an average of a million a year, gave us twenty-seven millions, making an aggregate of specie in the United States at the beginning of the year 1848, of $154,328,108. In that year the aggregate products of the mines of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and New Mexico, fell below the general average I have stated, having only reached about two hundred thousand dollars, to which California, just then beginning to open her treasures, contributed an additional sum of more than one fifth the product of all our mines at that time. She has, since that period, increased her product in almost a compound ratio, until he annual contributions to the metallic currency are one hundred millions, being two and a half times greater than the aggregate average annual yield between the years 1829 and 1848, of the Uralian, Mexican, Peruvian, Bolivian, Chilian, and, in fact, of all the mines in the world together?

Look back at the commercial crises at different periods of our history, and especially those within our recollection, from 1837 to 1840, when we suffered from a drain of our then very limited supply of the precious metals, and reflect upon the disasters which pervaded the country in every department and business of life. What is it but the gold of California that has held in equipoise our commercial balance, and furnished us with a redundant supply of bullion, notwithstanding the immense expansion of our trade and increased importations, whilst at the same time it has imparted wide-spread prosperity over the face of the whole country, by which mendicity has virtually been extinguished within our borders?

Did she clutch at and hold this massive treasure for her own benefit? No; she sent it back to your constituents; she dispensed it all over your territory. It reached your manufacturers of New England; it found its way to your farmers of the middle and western States, and to the cotton, rice, and sugar planters of the South; it gave unexampled activity to your workshops in every nook and corner of the land; it increased employment in your dock-yards, and gave new impetus to your shipping interest, until its stimulating influence was felt in the nerves of your whole industrial system.

We now come before you asking an appropriation of your domain, for the construction of this new means of intercommunication, indispensable not only to consolidate us at home, but to guard against the shock of foreign war, and consequent danger of political dismemberment.

The utmost stretch of your interposition will not exceed, under the bill before you, forty millions of acres for a line of two thousand miles, that will unite the Mississippi States with the Pacific. Its value does not equal by one half our annual supply of gold, and its concession will be more than reimbursed by the enhanced value imparted to the alternate residuum of your land. The measure, Senators, is one demanding your serious consideration.

For the maintenance of our claims upon Mexico, we expended far more than double the cost of the project before us. To recover and retain any fraction of territory within this Confederacy, we would exhaust the treasure of the country, and place posterity under tribute for centuries to come.

Rome, after the lapse of centuries, from her foundation, and in the peaceful reign of the Antonines, claimed the proud distinction that one hundred and twenty millions acknowledged her laws—a degree of population probably exceeding modern Europe in the eighteenth century, and supposed, by an enlightened historian to be “the most numerous society that has ever been united under the same system of government.” A people whose cities were connected by public highways issuing from the seat of empire, traversing Italy, pervading provinces, and terminating only with the frontiers, forming a great chain of communication from the wall of Antoninus to the capital, thence to Jerusalem, and stretching in distance over four thousand Roman miles.

Senators: Our progress as a nation has comparatively but begun; the immeasurable future lies before you. It is for us to do our part as patriots and legislators, under the mandates of the Constitution, to devise those means which will overcome geographical separation, and give unity to every part of this ocean-bound Republic.

By the natural law of increase, aided by a swell of immigration which the shock of European war and the reconstruction of nationalities will send to our shores, the new century that approaches, even though we are yet in the springtime of national existence, will find within our limits, now greater in territorial extent than Imperial Rome, a population equal to what she possessed in the zenith of her glory, after the growth of a thousand years.

Let the measure under consideration be consummated, and an act, vital to the integrity of our territory, and to the perpetuity of our undivided Union, will have been accomplished; and then, as a united people, WHO CAN PREDICT OUR FUTURE DESTINY?

On motion by Mr. MASON, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 10, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is a motion lying over from last Monday, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to promote Commander Duncan N. Ingraham to the grade of captain in the Navy of the United States, and that the Secretary of the Navy be requested to tender the command of one of the six first-class steam frigates provided for in the bill that passed the House on the 31st March, to Captain Duncan N. Ingraham, when such vessels may be ready for service.

Mr. DEAN. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will not withdraw the resolution for the present, and allow me to bring forward a matter of very great importance?

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no disposition to press this resolution upon the consideration of the House at this time; and I am perfectly willing, with the consent of the House, that it should lie over to be considered at another time, as the House is exceedingly thin.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania as withdrawing the resolution?

Mr. FLORENCE. For the present I will withdraw it, that the gentleman from New York may introduce his resolutions.

Mr. DEAN. I desire to bring before the House at this time a matter of very great importance to the commercial interests of the country; and for that purpose I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce two resolutions. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have recommended the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether this is not resolution day, when the States are to be called for resolutions? By pursuing the regular order, we will get a great many more resolutions through than we can in this informal way.

Mr. DEAN. Well, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to introduce the resolutions.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the war which now seems impending in Europe, it is the duty, as well as the manifest interest of the Government of the United States, to observe and maintain a strict neutrality between all the belligerents. And, in the event of a war, the rights of our citizens and the security of our commerce demand the maintenance of the principle heretofore asserted, and strenuously contended for by this Government, but not hitherto admitted or established as a law of nations—that free ships make free goods, except as to articles clearly known as contraband of war; and that the neutral flag protects from unreasonable search and seizure the ships bearing it. And also, that neutral property on board a vessel of any of the belligerents is not subject to seizure and confiscation.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to this House whether any, and if any, what arrangements have been made, or what correspondence has taken place between this Government and any of the Governments of Europe to establish the foregoing principles as international law, and to protect the neutral commerce of the United States in the event of a war between any of the Powers of Europe.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, is the introduction of these resolutions in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. WALKER. Then I object to it.

Mr. DEAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules of the House, so as to enable me to introduce it.

BOOKS FOR NEW MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. Before the House proceeds to act on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules, I beg leave to submit to the House a communication from the Clerk.

The following letter was thereupon read:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 6, 1854.

SIR: To enable me to proceed to the execution of the joint resolution approved February 24, 1854, ordering certain books for new members of the House of Representatives, I addressed letters to the publishers early in the month of March, inviting them to furnish the books voted. Having received replies from all the publishers written to, it appears that they can furnish “Annals of Congress,” “Senate Land Laws,” “Statutes at Large,” “Adams’s Works,” “Congressional Globe,” “Finance Reports,” “Constitution,” “Elliott’s Debates,” and “American Archives,” and that they cannot furnish the “State Papers,” “Reports of Debates,” “Contested Elections,” “Diplomatic Correspondence,” and “Alexander Hamilton’s Works.”

The books which the publishers cannot furnish, a bookseller of this city, who has supplied large numbers of the same books to Congress, has made a written offer to furnish at former prices and in a specified time, except the “Diplomatic Correspondence” and “Alexander Hamilton’s Works;” but as the resolution seems to confine the Clerk to purchases from the publishers, I have not felt at liberty to give him positive orders without express authority of the House.

The book known as “The Opinions of the Attorneys General,” specified in the resolution, embraces no opinions of later date than 1841; and as there is a very general desire to have an edition bringing them down to the most recent date, no inquiry has yet been made of the publishers concerning it. I respectfully ask further instructions from the House on this point.

The resolution is understood, by the publishers of “Mayo’s Treasury Regulations,” “Mayo & Moulton’s Pension and Bounty Land Laws,” and “Hickey’s Book of the Constitution,” to vote to the new members of the House the same numbers of each of these works as were received by the new Senators in the last Congress; but as this is doubtful, I have declined giving orders for them; and on this point, also, respectfully await the action of the House.

JOHN W. FORNEY.

Hon. LINN BOYD,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is my purpose to ask to have that communication referred to the Joint Committee on the Library. But I suppose it will meet with the general desire of the House to have such a resolution adopted as will enable the Clerk at once to execute the joint resolution for the delivery of books to new members. With that view I beg to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives furnish, and deliver to each of the Members and Delegates of the present Congress who have not already received them, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House, the following books, being a portion of the books voted to the members of former Congresses, viz: “State Papers,” “Register of Debates,” “Contested Elections,” and “Alexander Hamilton’s Works;” Provided, The prices do not exceed those heretofore paid; and that, instead of the “Opinions of Attorneys General,” heretofore supplied, he shall furnish and deliver the latest published edition that can be procured for fifteen dollars per copy, that being the amount paid for the Attorney General’s Opinions in the Thirty-First Congress.

Mr. FAULKNER. It will be seen by the House that the only effect of this resolution is this: The joint resolution which passed the House of Representatives and the Senate provides that these books shall be obtained from the publishers. The publishers, as I learn from correspondence now before me, have declared their inability to furnish them, and the only effect of this resolution is to enable the Clerk, at the same price, to obtain them elsewhere, otherwise the joint resolution will be nugatory.

Mr. HAVEN. I think this resolution and the communication from the Clerk ought to take a different direction from the one that has been indicated. I submit a motion that the said communication be printed, and that the resolution and communication also be referred to the House members of the Joint Committee on the Library. The reason why I make this motion is, that there is a law against furnishing certain books, and the effect of that law is only avoided by the joint resolution passed by the House and the Senate at the present session, and in the mode pointed out by that joint resolution. I submit that we shall run against and counter to that law of the last session, if we undertake to furnish these books, out of the contingent fund. I suggest to the House that this communication had much better be so referred, that the House may be put in possession, through a report of that committee, of the price and terms on which purchases can be made, and be enabled to take such action as may be necessary, and be deemed proper when such report is made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is one subject which the Clerk refers to in his communication which I think is not referred to in the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER.] It is as to the number of copies of Hickey’s Compilation of the Constitution, and some other books, which are to be furnished to members by the Clerk. Now, there never has been any extra copies of "Hickey's Constitution," or of those other books, furnished to members of the House for distribution. Each member, up to the present Congress, has received one copy of that book to make out his set of books ordered to be distributed to him by the House.

The joint resolution which passed last Congress is so worded that there shall be furnished to the new members of the Senate and the House of the present Congress, such books as were furnished to the new members of the Senate and the House of the last Congress. Under that reading of it, the publisher of that book claims that he has a right, as I understand, to furnish the same number of copies of that Constitution for each new member of this House that was furnished to the members of the Senate during last Congress. Such, sir, I conceive, was not the intention of the resolution, nor was it the understanding of the House, at the time it passed this House. The object and intention of the joint resolution which passed at the present Congress, was to furnish to each member one copy of such books as have heretofore been distributed to members for their own use.

Mr. FAULKNER. That was precisely the object which I had in view when I asked a reference of that communication to the Joint Committee on the Library. I concur entirely with the views of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES:] and desire to obtain from that joint committee an explanatory resolution, which will leave no room for controversy, nor any doubt of its correct interpretation, as contended for by that gentleman and myself.

Mr. JONES. Then I hope the resolution and communication will be referred as proposed; and with the further suggestion, that whatever the committee may report back upon this subject, they will not report that these books shall be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House.

That, sir, has not been customary. I think, if you will look back at every Congress since the Twenty-Eighth, you will find that there has been a specific appropriation, either in a deficiency or general appropriation bill, to pay for these books. The item for furnishing these books to the new members of this Congress will alone amount to, I suppose, at least $150,000. The Clerk has not furnished the precise sum; but I suppose it will amount to at least that. I think it should appear in a general appropriation bill, as a specific appropriation for that purpose. I hope, therefore, that the provision contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, proposing to pay this amount out of the contingent fund, will not be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing, and any amendment that may be necessary can be made there.

Mr. WASHBURNE. It was with reference to that motion that I wished to offer an amendment. I wished to provide that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Committee on Printing is a privileged committee, and has the right to report at any time, without any special order upon the subject. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was taken, and the resolution referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE RIGHTS OF NEUTRALS.

The question then recurred upon Mr. DEAN's motion to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce his resolutions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the resolutions may be again read.

The SPEAKER. They will be again read, unless objection is made.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question will be put to the House whether they shall be read.

The question was put, and the reading of the resolutions ordered.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it in order to say anything in favor of the adoption of the resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Debate is not in order upon the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was put; and, upon a division, 65 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

Upon a division, on the call for the yeas and nays, 27 rose in the affirmative, and 79 in the negative.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first ascertain whether a quorum is present. The Chair counted the number present, and found there were 153—a quorum.

Tellers on the yeas and nays were ordered; and Messrs. PHILLIPS and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DEAN. Before the Clerk proceeds to call the roll I would state to the House that the resolutions meet with the unanimous assent of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The question was then put; and on a division, there were—yeas 103, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Boccock, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chastain, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Cook, Crocker, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dent, Disney, Dunbar, Durham, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmunds, Edmundson, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenlon, Florence, Fuller, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Hemy, Hibbard, Biester, Howe, Hughes, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Latham, Lindsay, Macdonald, McDougall, Macy, Maxwell, Middlesex, John G. Miller, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, John Perkins, Phillips, Powell, Puryear, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Robbins, Rowe, Ruffin, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Simmons, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Walbridge, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, and Daniel B. Wright—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Ball, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Campbell, Chrisman, Corwin, Cox, Cullom, Everhart, Goode, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hunt, George W. Jones, Knox, Leitcher, McCallin, Mace, Matteson, Meacham, Norton, Olds, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pratt Sage, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Wade, Walker, Ellihu B. Washburn, Wells, and Zollieffer—41.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. DEAN. The resolutions are now before the House, I believe.

The SPEAKER. They are regularly before the House.

Mr. DEAN. I do not intend to detain the House by advocating the passage of these resolutions, but I desire to state what they contain.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to inquire if the resolutions are before the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolutions are before the body.

Mr. WASHBURNE. If debate arises upon them, will they not go over under the rules?

Mr. DEAN. The rules have been suspended.

The SPEAKER. The rules have been suspended; and, among them, the rule requiring the resolutions to go over if debate arises.

Mr. WASHBURNE. I supposed the rules were suspended only to admit the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The rule to which the gentleman refers applies only to resolutions introduced upon a call of the States. These resolutions are regularly before the body, and the gentleman from New York is properly on the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE. And are open to debate.

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. DEAN. I was saying, when the gentleman from Illinois interrupted me, that I did not desire to debate these resolutions at this time, but to state only to the House what they contain, and the principles they are intended to enunciate.

The first resolution is a plain and distinct statement of our duty to maintain neutrality in the war between the different Powers of Europe. It then reasserts the doctrine that has been so often asserted by the people and Executive Department of this Government, but which the judiciary of the country has failed to sustain; for Chancellor Kent says that international law, as understood in this country and in Europe, establishes a contrary rule. The Executive branch of our Government from its foundation, beginning with the Congress of the Confederation, and from that time to the present, has constantly, in its action and its diplomacy, endeavored to establish the rule that free ships make free goods, and the additional proposition that the goods of neutrals on board the ships of belligerents are also free from seizure or confiscation. This the first resolution contains:

The importance of this subject at the present crisis, when all Europe seems about engaging in a destructive war, cannot be expressed or scarcely estimated. The subject has been very recently discussed in the British Parliament. The Ministry have been called upon to state what they intend to do in reference to it. They have evaded meeting and disposing of the question, and avoided answering definitely what would be the action of that Government.

The second resolution calls for the correspondence between our Government and the Governments of any foreign Power upon this subject; and I may be permitted to state here, what I think will prove to be correct, that our Government has been for the last nine months engaged in endeavoring to get this principle established and admitted as the law of nations, and that our representative near the Court of St. James, in particular, has ably and, I believe, successfully accomplished it, so far as its recognition depends upon that Government. And it is admitted on all hands, that if Great Britain, which is the Power that has at all times prevented its being established, will unite with us in saying that it shall hereafter be the law of nations—not by a treaty, but by a proclamation, and by action during this war—it will hereafter be placed upon the firm basis of precedent as well as of natural right and justice.

I am informed that from the fact of its being unknown to the mercantile community what our Government intends to do, and what will be the action of the Government of Great Britain, insurances in all our large ports have increased, and that much anxiety is felt in reference to it. It is due to our merchants at this time to let them know what the action of the Government has been, and what Congress intends to do—whether it is our determination to carry out this doctrine at all hazards, or whether our merchant vessels must protect themselves, in the event of the war which seems threatening and inevitable.

I have no particular choice as to the language to be used, but I think that the Executive branch of the Government and Congress ought now to take its stand and say to the world, that this is our principle, that we will not be driven from it, that we will legislate to assert it, that we will negotiate to secure it, and if need be, that we will fight to maintain it. If we can establish this doctrine, it will be one of the proudest days in the annals of American history, for it is emphatically our doctrine—one that we have contended for from the days of the Revolution to the present time. I do not desire to move the previous question.

Mr. BOCKOCK. It strikes me that this is an exceedingly important proposition, one that undertakes to define the position that this Government will occupy in regard to the war which is impending in Europe. That ought to be done with due deliberation, and after mature consideration.

Positions rashly taken are easily abandoned. To give them weight and authority, these resolutions ought to have about them all the sanctions of matured action upon the part of the Congress of the United States. They are designed, as the gentleman has said, to make known to our merchants what they may rely on. They are intended also to produce effect upon the action of other countries. Will that result be produced by resolutions introduced here in the morning hour, and hurried through, without consideration? Ought they not to be sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and there discussed, examined, and carefully guarded in their wording? If they take untenable positions—which I by no means mean, upon the slight consideration which I have given them, to intimate, or if they are not strong enough—that committee ought to have the opportunity to modify them, or make them stronger, and if they are incautiously worded, that committee ought to have an opportunity to change the phraseology. Whatever is done ought to be done with care and deliberation.

I desire to make another suggestion before I take my seat. These resolutions are submitted to be acted upon by this House alone. They are not joint resolutions. If this Government intends to do anything effective and operative; anything to commit the country to a particular line of policy touching our foreign relations, it should be done by the Government itself, and not by the House of Representatives alone. It must be by joint resolution, requiring the action of the two Houses of the Congress of the United States, approved by the President.

These resolutions, I say, are mere resolutions submitted to be considered by this body alone; and therefore, if passed, they will have no effect, as the action of the Congress of the United States. They will amount to a mere expression of opinion on the part of the members of this House, and that hastily given. Under these circumstances, I move to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move the previous question.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I am willing that the resolution calling upon the President for information, may be passed.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions cannot be separated except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The committee can call upon the President for information.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was then taken on Mr. Bockock's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DENT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to present a resolution.

Mr. WELLS. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call upon the States for resolutions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DENT] entitled to the floor on his motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has a right to the floor, and asks the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution which will now be read by the Clerk.

Mr. WELLS. I object.

Mr. DENT. I hope that the House will allow the resolution to be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 301, and that the same be now considered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What bill is it?

Mr. DENT. I will explain its features.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Let the Clerk read the title.

The bill was read by its title, as follows:

A bill to regulate and define the duties of the Commissioner of Pensions in certain cases.

Several MEMBERS. Read the bill.

The bill of the House, No. 301, was thereupon read in extenso.

It provides that whenever any agent for paying invalid pensions shall have reason to believe that the disability which caused any person to be placed on the pension roll is totally or partially removed, it shall be the duty of said agent to suspend all further payment to such pensioner until such pensioner shall produce the affidavit of two physicians or surgeons, whose respectability shall be certified to by the officer before whom they may be qualified, stating from personal examination the continuance of the disability (describing it) for which the pension was originally granted, and the rate of such disability at the time of making such affidavit; and if in said affidavit the disability shall be stated at a rate below that for which the pension was originally granted, the pensioner shall only be paid at the rate stated in said affidavit.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions are now in order from the Territory of Utah.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion, to enable me to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given. It is a bill to aid the Territory of Minnesota and the State of Indiana in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes. The object of the bill is to construct certain links in the chain, so as to secure a continuous line of railroad from some point on Lake Superior to the Falls of the Ohio, and from thence, following the valley of the said river, to Cincinnati, Ohio.

I am about leaving town, and therefore it is that I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion to go into committee, so as to allow me to introduce this bill.

Mr. OLDS. And I am going to ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion for a like purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio withdrawn?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would prefer, Mr. Speaker, not to withdraw my motion just now. I would like to oblige both the gentlemen, but I cannot properly do so now.

The question was then taken on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH, of Tennessee, and CAMPBELL were appointed such tellers.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 31.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FULLER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 48) "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855."

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MACDONALD] was upon the floor, and is now entitled to the same.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. MACDONALD, in rising to speak on the subject of the Nebraska bill, said his record was made up as voting against the reference of the Senate measure to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He stood in this position with only three others coming from east of the Hudson river, on this issue. The Legislature of Maine did not propose to instruct him to vote against the bill, but put forth a modest request to that effect. But he did not intend to carry out their wishes, that body not properly representing public sentiment in that State. He pronounced the request as arrogant and impudent.

In his opinion, the allusion frequently made that a natural hostility exists between the North and the South—a natural dislike and jealousy—was perfectly groundless. Why should there be hostility between those sections? The memory of the past, the happiness of the present, and the hopes of the future, should not create hostility, but, on the contrary, the largest and most intense fraternal concord and agreement.

He regarded the election of Franklin Pierce as conclusive of the question that the old era of good feeling is to be reestablished between the North and the South, when a feeling similar to that which animated our revolutionary sires is again to prevail.

The natural opponents of this bill are the Abolitionists of the country, under the lead of the New York Tribune, a paper tainted with heresies and isms of every kind. The main editor of that paper does not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments. The tendency of their principles is that the people are not to be trusted, nor permitted to govern themselves, but must be governed. He commented at large on the character of Abolitionists.

The bill commended itself to his support because it asserted the right of the people to govern themselves. It was in 1850 that this Government inaugurated a new territorial policy, by allowing Utah and New Mexico to govern themselves; and the bill now pending was intended to carry out that republican and wholesome principle.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. FAULKNER, after having expressed his acquiescence in the compromise measures of 1850, said, that among all true men, whether from the North or from the South, there ought to be no diversity of opinion upon a question like that involved in the Nebraska bill. The public mind of the North had been shamefully abused by a perversion of the true issue involved in this question; for it was not a question of slavery or no slavery in regard to the organization of these proposed Territories.

The Missouri compromise, he maintained, was the first occasion upon which Congress assumed to exercise an act of original jurisdiction, the power of controlling the expansion of slavery within the territory of the United States, and of prescribing a limit beyond which the planter of the South should not emigrate with his property, recognized as such by the Constitution of the country. From the adoption of that compromise up to the present hour, the people of the South—or perhaps he might, with more propriety, confine himself to his own State—the people of Virginia had never ceased to regard it as an exercise of legislative authority not warranted by the language or the spirit of the Constitution.

He then reviewed the provisions of the Nebraska-Kansas bill of the Senate, and replied to the objections which had been urged against it by southern members, contending that the Badger proviso neither prohibited nor permitted slavery within these Territories, but left the entire subject to the people themselves.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CULLOM obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask my colleague to yield me the floor for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. CULLOM yielded for that purpose.

Mr. STANTON. I submit the motion.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 48) making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1855, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that motion, to enable me to introduce a bill merely for the purpose of reference.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. LANE then, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill "to aid the Territory of Minnesota and the State of Indiana to construct a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a memorial from the Territorial Legislature of Oregon, asking Congress to pass a law to enable the people of that Territory to form a constitution and State government preparatory to its admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

There was no objection; and the memorial was received, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HIESTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to; and thereupon,

At a quarter past three o'clock, the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 11, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. MORTON presented two petitions of inhabitants of Gadsden county, Florida, praying the establishment of a mail route from Tallahassee to Ridleysville; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the petition of Charles Vinson, praying compensation for extra services as a clerk in the office of the Third Auditor; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Rebecca Bright, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Morris Powers, praying a pension on account of disability incurred during the Mexican war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. RUSK gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the transportation of the mails of the United States on railroads.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MASON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to extend their railroad to a point on the Potomac river, at or near the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, it was Ordered, That the documents in relation to the claim of the Menomonee Indians be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

J. W. KELLY'S MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to inform the Senate whether a contract entered into by the Post Office Department with J. W. Kelly in 1853, for the transportation of the mail in steamers from Bainbridge, Georgia, to Appalachicola, Florida, has been annulled; and if so when, and for what reasons.

ISAAC P. SIMONTON.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, on the last private bill day, I asked to have the House bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Isaac P. Simonton laid on the table, with a view of offering an amendment to it so as to include another case. I have been applied to very strongly by those interested, to waive that request, and I should like to have the Senate now take up the bill and pass it without any amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $800 to the legal representatives of Isaac P. Simonton, on due and satisfactory proof being furnished that his claim for that sum, in schedule B, annexed to the treaty with the Saganaw band of Chippewa Indians, of the 14th of January, 1837, has regularly and legally descended to them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the motion will not be agreed to. I had very humbly suggested to the Senate, two or three days ago, that I should be very much obliged to them if they would take up, in the morning hour, a bill which I reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MASON. If it involves debate I must object to it.

Mr. BADGER. I do not know whether it will involve debate or not. I ask the Senate to take it up. I cannot remain here for the purpose of attending to it. I believe I am as seldom out of my place as any other member of the Senate. I am scarcely ever absent from the city of Washington during the sessions of the Senate, and I had thought that this little favor would be accorded to me.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator desires to be heard on his bill, I will cheerfully yield my motion; but if he wishes to have a debate on the bill, I must adhere to the motion.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to have the bill taken up and passed. I do not wish to be heard upon it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I presume there can be no serious opposition to the bill of the Senator from North Carolina. It is a very important measure. The Senator from North Carolina is very anxious upon the subject, and so are many other Senators. I hope the honorable Senator from Virginia will not object to it.

Mr. MASON. What is the bill?

Mr. BRIGHT. It is one to extend the time for the collection of duties on railroad iron. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Finance. If it leads to a lengthy debate, of course the Senator from North Carolina will not press it this morning.

Mr. STUART. I should be glad if the Senator from Virginia would give the Senator from North Carolina an opportunity to be heard upon that bill.

Mr. BADGER. I do not want to be heard upon it; but I wish to have the bill passed.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator thinks he can have it passed this morning, I can assure him that, in my opinion, there is very little prospect of it.

Mr. BADGER. Let us try.

Mr. MASON. I ask that the question be put on my motion.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Virginia, to proceed to the consideration of Executive business; and the question must be first put upon that, for it is the first motion before the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. Before that question is put, I wish to say, that while I have no disposition to embarrass the bill of the Senator from North Carolina, I think it is a bill upon which the State of Pennsylvania ought to be heard, and I observe that no members from that State are here. I shall, for that, if for no other reason, vote against acting upon that bill at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When that bill is taken up, I desire to offer an amendment to it in the shape of a substitute, and if we are to postpone it, I wish to have that proposition presented to the Senate for consideration. My impression is that it is so simple a question that the Senate will be ready to act upon it at any time, but I desire to present a substitute for the bill of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I will not press any objection to this motion. I have never, since I have been in the Senate, refused to any gentleman to give way for the purpose of transacting any business. I gave notice to the Senate last week that I should be obliged to leave the city early this week, and that I should throw myself upon their indulgence to take up this bill on Monday. I gave way yesterday in the application which I intended to make, for the purpose of obliging the Senator from California, being always willing to postpone my own personal convenience to the convenience of any and every member of this body. I thought yesterday that the privilege of having this bill taken up would be accorded to me to-day without difficulty; but a favor reluctantly conceded is not a favor. I therefore withdraw all objection, and will give up the expectation of having the bill taken up.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that we make the effort during the morning hour to see whether this bill can be disposed of; and, if it leads to discussion, the Senator from North Carolina will not press it to-day. I merely suggest that we had better take it up during the morning hour, with the understanding that if it is not disposed of during that hour it shall then be postponed, and we shall go into Executive session. I hope this course will be pursued.

Mr. MASON. Since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, I have felt, doubtless, in common with other Senators, under obligations to the Senator from North Carolina for the uniform example of courtesy which he has set us, and I certainly should be the last Senator to avoid the benefit of the example. I have done all that I could; I have said to that Senator that if he desired to be heard upon his bill I would, with great pleasure, yield my motion; but if he desires to take up the bill, which, as we have been informed, will lead to debate, and probably a protracted debate, I am not at liberty, because of the condition of the public business, to yield my motion. I ask, therefore, that we proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. MASON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Butler, Cass, Clay, Clayton, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Johnson, Mason, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Silldell, Toucey, and Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Bright, Brown, Chase, Douglas, Evans, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, James, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller—23.

So the motion was not agreed to.

RAILROAD IRON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill allowing a credit, for a limited period, for duties on railroad iron imported into the United States, reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment.

The original bill provides that a credit of five years shall be allowed on all unpaid bonds heretofore given for duties on railroad iron imported into the United States, or the Territories thereof, and on all bonds hereafter given for duties on railroad iron which shall be imported into the United States or the Territories, within the period of two years from the passing of this act; if it shall be made to appear, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the railroad iron has been imported for the purpose of being laid down on roads within the United States or the Territories thereof.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill back with an amendment, in the form of a substitute, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the owner, importer, or consignee of any railroad iron, imported within the period of two years from and after the passage of this act, may declare, under oath, on the entry thereof, that the said iron is exclusively designed and intended to be used in the construction or repairs of a road or roads within the United States, or the Territories thereof, and the said iron shall be entered for warehousing, and may be withdrawn, in any quantity not less than one ton, on due entry for that purpose to be used as aforesaid, at any time within five years from the date of importation, or payment for such charge for storage as may have accrued thereon: Provided, That the owner, importer, or consignee, shall, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector of the customs at the port of entry, become bound to the United States in double the amount of the duties thereon to pay the legal duties and charges on said iron, with interest thereupon at the rate of six per cent. per annum until paid, on or before the expiration of five years, from and after the date of importation, and to furnish within that period proof, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the iron so bonded and withdrawn has been actually used in the construction or repairs of a road or roads, as aforesaid; and if such satisfactory proof shall not be so furnished within the period aforesaid, the whole penal sum named in said bond shall be forfeited and paid to the United States: And provided further, That if the iron bonded and withdrawn from warehouse as aforesaid, shall, at any time within the said period of five years, be used for any other purpose than the construction of a road or roads within the United States, or the Territories thereof, the whole penalty of the bond shall be at once forfeited to the United States, which forfeiture may be enforced by due process of law in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the owner, importer, or consignee of any railroad iron now in warehouse under bond may, at any time within the period allowed by existing provisions of law for such iron to remain in warehouse, file with the collector of the customs having the charge and custody of the iron, the declaration, and execute the bond prescribed in the first section of this act, whereupon the bond given on the original entry shall be canceled, and the said owner, importer, or consignee, shall become entitled to all the privileges and be subject to all the requirements, conditions, and penalties specified in this act: Provided, That where a railroad is wholly owned by a State, no other security shall be required than a bond binding the property in said road for the payment of the duties as herein prescribed; and in all cases those representing the railroad may elect to give either the personal security above mentioned, or a lien upon the railroad and its property at their pleasure.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That before the owner, importer, or consignee of such railroad iron shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, the president and directors of the road or roads, for which the benefits of this act are claimed, shall enter into an agreement to transport the mails of the United States, upon the terms and conditions now prescribed by law.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to strike out all that portion of the bill which forfeits double the amount of the duty. It will be perfectly useless to make such a provision, if any unforeseen event should occur, and the company could not pay the amount to recover double the amount as is proposed by the bill. In such a case it seems to me that Congress would release it. I think the provision for the payment of the debt and interest is amply sufficient.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will state to the Senator from Mississippi that I have an amendment which I design to offer to the substitute of the committee, and which, if it meets with his approbation, will dispense with the necessity for his amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The substitute that I offer is to this effect: instead of giving a credit on railroad iron for a limited time, we suspend the duty on railroad iron until the 1st of July, 1857; because if you give a credit I am not certain that you render any substantial assistance to the railroad interest under the bill. You will have an uncertain debt suspended over the company in, perhaps, the expectation that Congress may remit the penalties and duties when they become due, without any certainty of such remission. You tell the railroad companies, therefore, to be ready to meet a debt when they hope not to be required to meet it; and I am afraid you neither benefit the Treasury nor the railroad interest of the country by a proposition of that kind. We have now a surplus of money in the Treasury. We have a larger revenue than we desire. It is our duty, if we intend properly to reduce the revenue within the necessary demands of the Government, to adopt some such measure as this. Between this and 1857 I do not think we shall need the revenue arising from importation of railroad iron. I know of no item upon which you can take off the revenue with greater facilities and advantages to the great material interests of the country than upon this item. For that reason I propose, instead of giving a credit of five years, that we suspend the duties until the first day of July, 1857. Then, when the period expires, the duty is again to be levied as it now exists without any other legislation, unless Congress in the mean time determine to extend or change it. The substitute which I offer provides for this and for nothing else. It is to strike out of the substitute reported from the committee, all after the word "that," and insert the following:

Where it shall be satisfactorily proved to the Secretary of the Treasury that any railroad iron imported since the first day of July, 1853, and prior to the passage of this act, for the purpose of being applied to the construction or repair of any railroad, has been actually laid down on any railroad, he shall allow a drawback of the duties on such railroad iron, so laid down, or if the duties shall have been actually paid, he shall refund the same to the company or party thus laying down said iron.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of any law now in force, as imposes a duty on imported railroad iron, be suspended from and after the passage of this act, until the 1st day of July, 1857; and no duties or revenue shall be collected on railroad iron from foreign countries prior to the said 1st day of July, 1857: Provided, however, That at the time of such importation, the importers shall execute to the United States a bond, with such sureties and such penalties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct, to be approved by said Secretary, conditioned that said iron is bona fide imported for the purpose of being used for rails for railroads, and for no other purpose, and to be laid down and actually used by the person or companies so importing the same, within two years from the time of importation, and upon due proof furnished to the said Secretary of the Treasury that said iron has been so laid down and used, the said bonds shall be given up and canceled: And provided further, That no iron shall be considered as railroad iron, within the meaning of this act, except such as is prepared to be laid down as rails upon railroads, without further manufacture.

Mr. WALKER. There is a case for which the bill, as reported by the committee, provides, which I do not think is provided for by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. It is that contained in the second section of the committee's amendment, where an importation has already taken place, and bonds have been given. It provides that those cases shall have some relief.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will state to the Senator that the proposition which I make provides for all importations since the first of July last.

Mr. BADGER. Allowing a drawback of the duties.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Giving a drawback of duties; otherwise it might operate injuriously on importations made within a short time past.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to say that I very decidedly prefer the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the substitute reported by me from the Committee on Finance. I think it has every recommendation, and I do not see that it can lead to any material debate. In the first place, it applies to railroad iron which is to be used for rails, and to no other species of railroad iron. In the next place, it applies to that railroad iron which is imported in such a condition as that it can be laid down without further manufacture. In the third place, it proposes a suspension for three years of the acts of Congress levying duties, and by giving it a retroactive effect, it becomes, in fact, the proposition which the Senator from Illinois submitted last Congress giving a suspension of these duties on railroad iron.

I think it has manifold advantages. In the first place, as he has said, our revenue is now ample. To give a credit, in the terms proposed by the substitute, upon the importer or company giving bonds for the payment of the amount of duties and interest, is to give nothing to the company except the mere delay of payment; but under the provisions of the Senator's amendment there will be a real, beneficial encouragement extended to this great and important enterprise. There is scarcely a possibility that within three years the Government will need the revenue derived from the duties on railroad iron, for any of the purposes of the Government. Confining the suspension to that short period, we may be sure that no injury will be done to the Government; and if in the mean time any change shall take place which makes it necessary that the Government shall receive the advantage of revenue upon imported railroad iron, as the Senator from Illinois has said, we will have nothing to do at the expiration of the time; but the duties will be levied as if this act had not passed.

It seems to me, with the Treasury overflowing, that this is as small a benefit as Congress can be expected to extend to these great enterprises all over the country, which tend so much to the prosperity, not only of individual portions, but to the advancement, the connection, the cultivation of intercourse, the exchange of commodities, and the establishment of good feeling, and of united, patriotic friendship among the different members of this great confederacy. I hope that my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. HUNTER,] will have no objection to this amendment, but that he will prefer it to the substitute reported by the direction of the committee.

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to this bill, I vote under instructions. I regard the proposition offered as an amendment by the Senator from Illinois, as nearer to the instructions than the other; and I incline to think that it is a good financial expedient, as our revenue is greater than the wants of the Government demand.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Virginia, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, whether he can give me a general idea of how much the revenue derived from the duties on railroad iron amounts to?

Mr. HUNTER. The duty on railroad iron, manufactured, rolled, or otherwise, is about $4,600,000.

Mr. SEWARD. I suppose that is correct. I have not now access to the tables to verify it. I shall not now detain the Senate by discussing this subject as fully as I intended to do. The proposition offered by the Senator from Illinois is similar to the one which he offered at the last session, and which was withdrawn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was withdrawn not because of objection to it, but because it was deemed improper to attach it to a general appropriation bill.

Mr. SEWARD. If the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] will introduce a bill giving credit for, or even suspending the duties upon the railroad iron imported for the completion of the railroad in that State which he has especially under his care, I will vote for it with the greatest pleasure in the world. I will do so, because I think that a very necessary, a very useful, and a very great work; and I think that the region of country where it is to be made, requires and ought to receive such a favor at the hands of Congress. I am free to say that I would vote for that as an exception to the general law which is now in force; but I cannot agree with the general policy now proposed. The proposition of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is to remit the duties on railroad iron for three years. I think that worse, in one respect, than to remit them indefinitely; because it will, for the future, render everything, in regard to the manufacture of railroad iron in this country, uncertain and unreliable.

It will, so far as it goes, discourage the establishment of manufactories for the making of railroad iron; and will probably have the same effect now as if the measure were the abolition of the duties on railroad iron altogether. Then, soon after we shall have got into this period of three years, those who are interested in the construction of railroads, and those who are interested in the manufacture of railroad iron in this country, will be brought to the consideration of the question of what will probably be the action of Congress—whether they will, at the expiration of the time, remove the duties altogether, or whether they will suffer them to be restored? Here will be a field of perplexing and dangerous speculation, amounting almost to gambling on the policy of the country.

I think, therefore, that the proposition is objectionable on the ground that it introduces uncertainty into the financial system of the Government, so far as it operates upon the importation and on the manufacture of railroad iron—great and extensive interests in this country. Again, I do not see that because there is, at this moment, a surplus in the Treasury of the United States, we are able to say with confidence that it would be safe to reduce our revenues at this particular juncture. Sir, this is a moment of great interest and feverish anxiety throughout the commercial world. We cannot contemplate the aspect which Europe presents, without seeing that there is to be, in all human probability, a general war pervading the continent of Europe, and reaching even into the continent of Asia. We see that a vast amount of capital in Europe has already been begun to be withdrawn from its accustomed investments, and converted into loans for the support of the armies and navies of belligerent nations. We see that loans have been made by France, by Turkey, and by Austria; and that loans are attempted to be made by Russia. We know, also, that England is to be a party to that war—a leading party; and that funds to a large amount will be immediately required by her to carry on its operations. The very shadow of these events has produced a panic in all commercial circles on the continent. Stocks have already fallen on the Bourse, in Paris, and on the Exchange, in London. Our own stocks have also become depreciated, and are quoted at nominal prices; and they are returning upon us.

Whatever may be the final result, and its bearing upon the interests of this country, we see that the country feels already the approach of a crisis. Good, well-established stocks have fallen within the last week in the expectation of the commencement of war in Europe from five to seven per cent., and the fall, it is thought by many, has only just begun. Not only is this seen, but there are also the indications of the commencement of a commercial revulsion. We have been sending from the eastern States to San Francisco large quantities of flour, and of implements of agriculture, and of those for mining, and I have observed, within a few days past, that vessels have returned from thence freighted with their own outgoing freights, instead of gold, and that that is producing derangement in our Pacific region. The effect of this will be a similar derangement elsewhere to a greater or less extent.

Now, although we have a surplus revenue, and have had for a few years past, no one can say that the imports of the next three years will exceed the wants of the Treasury. On the contrary, those who will take the pains to examine, will find that the imports have already sensibly diminished since the shadow of this European war fell upon us. We are then to have, in all probability, for a time, a reduction of the imposts and duties. This, therefore, seems to me just the worst time in which to depart from the system which we have been pursuing in regard to the revenue.

In the next place, if it were true that it were perfectly safe to reduce our revenues, I have heard no argument to satisfy me that the iron interest is that interest which ought to bear the entire reduction. It seems to me to be an entire departure from every principle of equity to make the reduction bear on this single interest alone. But, again, if this reduction of revenue is conceived to be safe, upon what basis can we reckon that, during the next three years, we shall not have occasion, at home, for all the revenue which we can collect? If we are to construct a railroad, or aid in the construction of a railroad to the Pacific ocean, we shall need, after the liberal gratuities of the public lands which have been given to other roads, to fortify the Treasury—to replenish and keep it full instead of reducing its stores. Thus, if this proposition proceeds upon the ground that we are to remain at peace, it seems to me very objectionable. But who knows how long we are to be able to keep, as a party, out of the convulsion which is coming on in the nations of Europe? I think no one can say that our neutral rights are so sure to be respected by the belligerents in Europe, that we shall not become, if not an active party, at least a party so far as to render it necessary to use our military and naval power for the protection of the rights of our citizens and their commerce. In every point of view, therefore, which I can take of this subject, it seems to be unwise.

There is but one other remark which I wish to present now; I see here a proposition for the aid and support of all the railroads in the United States. I believe that, in regard to the one which has caused this measure to be brought before us, it is reasonable and just in a limited degree; but I do not know why, because a railroad in North Carolina is in need of this aid, the capitalists of Boston, the capitalists of New York, or the capitalists of Philadelphia, who are engaged with adequate means in the construction of railroads, as largely and as extensively as is consistent with the general interests of society, so as to avoid a derangement of the whole business of the country, ought also to receive this boon at our hands, and at the cost of the other interests of the country. On these grounds I am not willing to vote for the bill.

Mr. STUART. I had examined the bill and substitute reported from the Committee on Finance, and was perfectly satisfied that it was one which I could not support. How it may be in respect to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Illinois, I really do not feel prepared to say. It must be obvious to every Senator that the subject proposed is one of vast importance, in every point of view. I think there are points of importance involved in it which perhaps are greater than at first blush would strike the mind of almost any man. I confess the more I think of the subject, the more magnitude it seems to possess; and, therefore, I suggest the propriety of postponing the consideration of the subject until to-morrow, so that we may have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois printed and before us, and see very clearly what it is that we are about to do.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will allow me, I will state at this point that I have received a letter from one of the Senators from Pennsylvania, stating his anxiety to be here when this subject is considered. He expected to be here last night, but was attacked with sickness, and therefore prevented.

Mr. STUART. I was only intending to add, that a subject of this importance should not be acted upon—I submit to the Senate—on an amendment which we have merely heard read from our table. I therefore move that the farther consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow, and that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois be printed.

Mr. WELLER. I hope the motion of the Senator from Michigan will meet with no objection. The Senators from Pennsylvania desire on this question to represent and defend the interests of their State. Either of them is able to do so; but both of them are confined by indisposition, and neither of them is able to be here to-day; and therefore I think there is a peculiar propriety in postponing the consideration of the question until to-morrow, when one of them may be here.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to say, that I have not the slightest objection to the motion of the Senator from Michigan. We can have the amendment printed by to-morrow, and one of the Senators from Pennsylvania will be here by that time. I will then ask the Senate to take up the bill—not with any desire to press it to the exclusion of every other business, or to give it any undue advantage; but with the view of having the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. RUSK. I should like, if it would be as convenient to the Senator from North Carolina, to have the bill postponed for a longer period. I have given notice, this morning, of my intention to ask leave to introduce a bill which shall cover the ground proposed by this bill, as well as provide permanently for the transportation of the mails. It is a subject which ought to be acted upon promptly. These railroad companies now carry the mails or not, as they choose; and it seems to me to be very important, in any action taken upon the subject of reducing the duties on iron, or taking them off altogether, that we should make some provision further than this bill does in relation to the transportation of the mails. The truth is the Department is now at the mercy of the railroads. There is a quarrel existing at this time between them. I have not looked into the matter, and do not pretend to say which is right; but certainly it is very desirable that we should make some provision which shall apply to those railroads that are in existence, as well as to all those which shall hereafter be constructed, by which confusion in regard to the mails may be avoided, and at the same time diminish the great expense attendant upon their transportation, under the present system.

I will state briefly, and in general terms, what I shall propose to do by the bill of which I have given notice.

It is this: To authorize any company owning any road which has been completed, or such as may be hereafter constructed, that will enter into contracts with the Postmaster General to transport forever, free of charge, the mails upon their roads, under such rules as Congress or the Postmaster General may prescribe, to import all iron necessary for the construction, repairs, or relaying their roads, free of duty. I shall propose, also, to go still further. Railroads are being carried forward with great rapidity. I have voted for all the bills granting alternate sections to such roads. I expect to vote for all that may ask for grants hereafter. But it is evident, from the action of Congress for the last two or three sessions, that the system of grants, if applied at all, will be applied very partially. It will be of no general benefit; for, notwithstanding the great facilities with which such bills pass the Senate, they uniformly fall in the House of Representatives; so that in place of being of general benefit, it perhaps tends to create ill-feeling in different sections of the country. One section is more fortunate in getting railroad bills through than another; and it consequently creates jealousy, distrust, and ill-feeling, which interfere with legislation. I propose—in the bill which I have not yet matured, but of which I have given notice this morning—in addition to authorizing the construction of roads, to grant to all railroad companies who shall enter into contracts for carrying the mails on the terms I have indicated, and who shall construct a substantial double track, six sections of land to the mile, out of the public lands of the United States. I think that by some such policy as this, we shall make a great saving of expense to the Government, facilitate and promote the construction of roads, and greatly diminish the risk of human life by procuring the building of double tracks.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. For all roads?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir, all roads in the United States; so as to make it a general bill. That was my idea upon the subject, and I should be glad to have time to present my plan before taking a final vote upon this bill.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, the plan suggested by my friend from Texas is a very large one; and I do not know but that when he brings it forward, I shall be entirely in favor of it; but I hope he will not embarrass this bill with it. The bill is, by no means, necessarily connected with his proposed plan. They are independent measures, and each may be adopted, or one may be adopted without the other, so far as I see, without any necessary inconvenience.

I have no objection, as I have already stated, to the postponement of this bill until to-morrow; because I think it is fair to the Senate, and I think it is fair to the absent Senators from Pennsylvania; but if this subject is to be postponed long, so far as the State which I represent is concerned, it will be a matter of very little importance whether the bill passes or not.

Now, sir, my own position is this: I have always believed both in the power of Congress, by duties, to protect the domestic industry of this country, and in the expediency of Congress exercising that power within reasonable guards; or, as General Jackson expressed it, I have always been, at least for many years past, in favor of a "judicious tariff;" and it has never been my fortune yet to meet with any man in or out of Congress who was not. But, sir, I confess, if the only operation of a "judicious tariff" is to impose burdens upon a State that scarcely ever receives anything from the country; and if the effect of that system is to postpone the consideration of a small bill, which proposes no exclusive benefit to that section of the country, but is, as it ought to be, impartially applicable to the whole country, I shall begin to doubt very seriously whether a "judicious tariff" is a judicious thing to be supported by a representative of North Carolina.

I hope, sir, that we will take up and dispose of the pending measure before the Senate. It is not complex in its details. It is easily understood. Its application and effect no one can misunderstand. If the Senate is in favor of it, I hope it will be passed. If the Senate is opposed to it, I shall enter no complaints; I shall submit, as I ought to do, with most perfect acquiescence in its determinations on the subject; but I beg that my friend from Texas will not complicate this little matter about suspending the duties on railroad iron with the large scheme for the Post Office which he proposes to bring forward.

Mr. PRATT. I hope my honorable friend from North Carolina will consent to a postponement to a longer day than the one which has been designated. He says that a postponement for a longer period would result in depriving the railroad in his State of the benefits which he proposes to result from this bill. I cannot see that that will be so; because, if the substitute which has been offered by the Senator from Illinois be adopted, I apprehend, inasmuch as it not only releases all iron hereafter to be imported, but also iron which has been imported since the first of July last, the Senator's railroad will not be deprived of the benefits which this bill proposes to confer. Then, whether it pass now or a month hence, it will have no effect upon the road.

Now, sir, the State of Pennsylvania, unrepresented at this moment on the floor of the Senate, is the State most deeply interested in the question of depriving the iron interest of the protection afforded by the duty proposed to be taken off; and perhaps the little State of Maryland is the one next most interested. My colleague [Mr. PEARCE] is away; he has been called home by indisposition in his family. Both of the Senators from Pennsylvania are absent from their seats because of indisposition. Then I submit to the Senate whether, when there is no possible necessity for pressing the subject to immediate decision, it would not be just to postpone it until those States are fully represented upon this floor? I hope, therefore, that the Senator from North Carolina, who is obliged to go home, will consent to a postponement until after he shall have returned; and I will propose Monday week, instead of to-morrow, as the day to which this bill shall be postponed.

Mr. President, the remarks of the honorable Senator from New York well deserve the attention of the Senate and of the country. We are upon the verge of a great commercial crisis. Every one must see it. We have had laid upon our tables within a few days past, in reply to a resolution of a Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] now absent, a statement of the indebtedness on the part of this country to European capitalists, and I find that it is $222,225,315. This amount is already due to foreigners by the companies and people of this country in railroad bonds for railroad iron, and on other securities. We know that these railroad bonds are falling in the market. The effect of the crisis in Europe has been to send them back here for sale, and you find that every one of this description of securities is going down in the market. I apprehend that it will not require stimulants for the purpose of having an increase of railroads, but that the true policy of the country at this time is to do nothing at any rate which shall stimulate the different sections of the country in increasing the number of these roads. If these two hundred and twenty-two millions of our securities held abroad be brought back here for sale in our market, every one must see that it will bring about a commercial crisis, such as has not been known in the country for half a century—such certainly as has not been experienced within the last twenty or thirty years.

At any rate, sir, the subject is certainly one of sufficient importance to entitle it to mature consideration. It should therefore be postponed, and the amendments should be printed, that every one may be enabled to see their bearing, and their full bearing. We should have the proposition of the Senator from Texas [Mr. RUSK] before us, so that if anything is to be done, we may see what can be done with the least injury to that great class of the community, the iron interest of this country; and, at the same time, if we are bound to benefit these corporations, that we may do so.

For myself, on looking at this subject, I cannot see why the Government of the United States should be bound to contribute $4,000,000 annually to the large capitalists, who have engaged their means, for the purpose of making money by the construction of railroads in the different sections of this country. That is the bald proposition, stripped of everything which surrounds it, and you are to disturb your tariff and to strike down the greatest interest protected by it, for the purpose of giving that amount of money to the capitalists engaged in this particular adventure!

I hope my proposition to postpone this bill until next Monday week, will be acceded to by the Senate, if not by the Senators who have this bill immediately in charge. By that time, we may hope to have present, both my colleague and the Senators from Pennsylvania, and we shall then understand better than we do now what is to be the effect of this measure, and its results upon the country, and particularly upon the great interest at which it certainly strikes in some degree; at least to the extent of the protection afforded by the imposition of an annual duty of over $4,000,000.

The proposition of the Senator from Illinois contains another feature which, as it was read, struck me to be rather singular in its effect. It proposes not only to take off the duty on iron to be imported for railroad purposes hereafter, but it is to have a retroactive effect, and the Government is to refund the duties paid upon all such iron imported since the 1st of July last. If that is to be the policy of the country—if we are to give to capitalists who have not yet completed these works the money which they have paid to the Government as import duties on iron for their particular roads—how, I ask, can we refuse to give to the capitalists of your State, sir, and of mine, who have completed their roads, the duties which they have paid for the railroad iron used on those roads? This is a bounty to capitalists; and I ask, in justice and fairness, why those who have made a road from this city to Baltimore, and a road from Baltimore to the Ohio river, without which many of these other roads would be comparatively useless, and those who have made other roads which have been completed, and the investments in which have been entirely unproductive, should not have returned to them the amount of duties which they paid? Those who are now being engaged in the construction of these roads are, according to this proposition, to have returned to them the duties which they may have paid since July last! It is an arbitrary rule. Why it should be July I do not know, except that that time suits some particular road, or particular class of roads. And why it should not as well be July, 1850, as July, 1853, I do not know.

Mr. President, this is certainly a subject which requires more consideration than can be bestowed upon it this morning; and I do hope that the Senate will concur in having it postponed till Monday week.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I think it is very evident, from the discussion this morning, that it will be impossible to dispose of this question now. I do not think it ought to be disposed of without a full investigation. Why, sir, it is a proposition to give $4,000,000 per annum to the railroad companies in the United States; and that my friend from North Carolina calls a very "small" thing. He said he hoped my friend from Texas would not embarrass this "little" bill of his with any proposition growing out of the carrying of the mails of the United States. Sir, it seems to me this is a very important measure. It is a proposition to take $4,000,000 out of the Treasury and give that to railroad companies now organized in the United States, thus enabling them to compete successfully with other companies who have constructed their roads, and have paid full duties upon their iron! That strikes me, at first blush, as unjust. There are many railroads in the United States which have been completed for years, and are now in successful operation; and there are companies being organized for the purpose of constructing roads along the same lines, intended to compete with them; and you propose that the companies now being organized shall import into the United States their iron free of duty. This, it seems to me, would be an act of injustice to those who have already constructed roads after having paid the duties exacted by law.

But, sir, there is another question which should weigh with us. You are to look to the manufactories which have been established in the United States for the manufacture of railroad iron. I desire to have an opportunity of ascertaining what will be the effect of abolishing the duties on railroad iron on the manufactories which have been established in this country. It does seem to me, on the first blush, that the effect must be to strike down all those manufacturers of our own who have invested their capital in this particular branch of industry. But I have not turned my attention to this point. I trust, however, the bill will not be allowed to pass without full investigation—without our knowing exactly what we are doing—how it will affect not only the rights and interests of capitalists who have completed their roads, but how far it will affect the interests of the capitalists of the country who have invested their money in the manufacture of railroad iron.

A short time since I indicated a wish that this question ought to go over in order that the two Senators who feel a particular interest in it should have an opportunity of being heard. They are understood to represent the iron interest of this country, and I desire that they shall be fully heard, not only for my own satisfaction, but for the satisfaction of others, who may be, unfortunately, as ignorant of the true effect of this measure as I am. All that I desire to say to-day is, that this strikes me, at first, blush as an unjust thing—as a measure which is calculated to build up a particular set of companies at the expense of others, and that it will have an effect upon your Treasury to diminish your receipts some four or five millions of dollars per annum. I do not know how you propose to dispose of the surplus revenue which you collect; but, in my judgment, there will be ample opportunities presented in the next four or five years for the investment of every dollar of it wisely and beneficially.

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I concur with those Senators who have expressed the opinion that this is a subject of too much importance to be considered and disposed of in one, two, or even three mornings. I am of opinion, however, that something ought to be done in relation to the subject-matter of this bill. In the section of country which I represent there is a very large interest connected with the construction of railroads—railroads not being constructed by large capitalists, but many of which are dependent upon the subscriptions of farmers and planters on the lines of those roads. Since the great rise in the price of labor, as well as of iron, some of those companies who commenced their works under fair auspices, and with the expectation of completing them without difficulty, find themselves at this time very much embarrassed. Now, although the Southwest has a considerable interest in the iron manufacture, I am not aware that any of the capitalists engaged in that business in that region have any disposition to engage in the manufacture of railroad iron. Nevertheless, I think a more general view ought to be taken of this subject than any one which is confined to any particular locality or interest—to one or more States. There is one consideration connected with this subject which ought to be weighed before we can determine wisely upon it, which I think has not yet been suggested by any gentleman.

In the present state of the Treasury, the financial question connected with this measure—the question of how much would be subtracted by it from the present means of the Government, or its prospective revenue in reference to any immediate future before us, or in regard to what may be the condition of Europe—is not so important, in my judgment, as another question; I mean a question connected with the manufacture of railroad iron in this country.

A very intelligent gentleman of my own State, the president of one of the companies which finds itself somewhat embarrassed by the circumstances to which I have already alluded, forwarded to me some time ago a memorial asking Congress to suspend the collection of the duty on railroad iron until a limited time after the roads now being constructed should be put into operation. In a private communication to me, he went into the reasoning on which the prayer of that memorial was founded. No one of the company of which he is the president is at all interested in the iron manufacture; but taking a larger view of the subject, and looking to the interest of all sections of the country, and the railroad interest generally, his conclusion against the repeal of duty on railroad iron seemed to me to be well supported. The prayer of the memorial was to suspend the collection of the duty until three years after the road should go into operation. He was of the opinion that suspension would probably be more beneficial to the railroad interest than the repeal of the duty.

Sir, I confess that his reasoning made an impression upon my mind. He contended—and it struck me forcibly—that if you repeal the duty entirely, you place the whole railroad interest, so far as it is connected with the price of railroad iron, within the control of the English manufacturers. He was persuaded that the repeal of the duty would be followed by the immediate suspension of the works now engaged in the manufacture of railroad iron in this country. The English manufacturers, seeing this result—seeing that the suspension of these works, and the withdrawal of capital from them, would in a year or two advance their prices; so that the full amount deducted from the present price of railroad iron in this country by the repeal of the duty would probably be more than balanced by the increased price of railroad iron in England.

Well, sir, since receiving that communication, I have taken occasion to converse with gentlemen who are far better informed on this subject than myself, and they concur in the sentiment that it will be impossible for the manufacturers of railroad iron in the United States to compete successfully with the English manufacturers, if the existing duty is repealed. The moment it is understood that the existing duty is to be repealed or suspended, manufacturers will close their business, and look about for some other employment of their capital and labor; they will consider their investments for the present as a total loss, as the larger portion of their machinery is not fit to be applied to the manufacture of any other description of iron. Now, sir, as I understand, about eighty thousand tons of railroad iron are now annually manufactured in the United States, being nearly or quite one fourth the whole consumption. Taking the average of the last few years, this is, perhaps, not quite one fourth; but certainly eighty thousand tons per annum is a very considerable proportion of the railroad iron used in the United States. If we suppose that the consumption of this article in this country amounts annually to $15,000,000 in value, then the importations of it would amount to about $12,000,000, and the manufacture in this country, one fourth of the whole, would be about $3,000,000 in value. I have not looked into the statistics or the official reports upon this subject, nor have I informed myself from other sources of the actual state of the trade in this article, as I was not aware that this subject would be taken up this morning; but the fact, I believe, is, that about one fourth of the railroad iron now consumed in the United States is manufactured in this country. If you repeal the duty, these manufacturers will at once cease their operations, and this would produce an increased demand to that amount upon the English manufacturers; and the inference drawn by my friend who made this communication to me, accompanying the memorial from Tennessee to which I have alluded, was, that probably the whole amount of the duty would be made up in a very short time by the increased price of railroad iron in England.

Now, sir, what is to be the effect of the present aspect of affairs in Europe, is a different question. When the gentleman to whom I have referred made these calculations, it was with no reference to any such crisis as that which now seems impending in Europe. I believe that one of the greatest causes of the large increase in the price of railroad iron, particularly in England, is not so much owing to the great demand from the United States, as the demand for the construction of railroads on the continent of Europe. If there shall be a general war in Europe, which seems now to be very probable, it may be that it will produce a cessation of the construction of the numerous railroads projected on that continent; and that the railroad manufacturers in England, instead of raising their prices, will find themselves under the necessity of selling their iron at rates very much reduced below those which have obtained during the last two years. How that may be I am not able to state, or to make any inference which would be worthy of consideration.

But, sir, there is not yet a general war in Europe, and there is a possibility that there may be no war in Europe. If the continent generally remains in a state of peace, those works of internal improvement which are now being constructed there, and to which I have referred, will probably continue to progress as they have done within the last four or five years; and if that be so, the demand from the continent for English railroad iron will continue; and if it should continue in this country, even to an extent diminished by twenty or thirty per cent. from what it has been within the last two or three years, it would still be an enormous demand. Under these circumstances, the fair inference may be made that as soon as our own manufacturers should be obliged to stop their works, and abandon the idea of continuing them at any profit, the English manufacturers would immediately take advantage of it, and add twenty or thirty per cent. to the price of their rails. This is a consideration which demands serious attention. I have conversed with other gentlemen upon this subject, not manufacturers of iron, but with persons who seem to have taken an interest in the subject, and I am inclined very much to adopt the opinion of the gentlemen with whom I have conferred, and who say that the better policy would be to reduce the duty, instead of repealing it. The proposition now presented by the Senator from Illinois amounts, in fact, to a suspension for six years.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Four years.

Mr. BELL. I understand it to be that no duties shall be charged upon any iron imported since the 1st of July, 1852, and prior to the 1st of July, 1857—

Mr. DOUGLAS. From 1853 to 1857.

Mr. BELL. To July, 1857; and that no duty shall be chargeable upon any railroad iron imported in that year (1857) to be used within two years thereafter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The duty is to be suspended on iron imported between the 1st of July, 1853, and the 1st of July, 1857—four years.

Mr. BELL. I understand that; but the honorable Senator, I think, did not quite understand my proposition. I contend that this amounts, practically, to a suspension for six years; and I will state the reason. If the duty be suspended for four years, then, towards the expiration of that time, in anticipation of a renewal of the duty on the 1st of July, 1857, capitalists, whether connected with railroads or not, would consider it to be a profitable speculation to make very large importations in anticipation of the demand for railroad iron within the next two years. There is no question of that. So that, in point of fact, this would amount to a suspension for six years.

But, sir, I was speaking of the sentiments of gentlemen who have looked largely into the subject, and who have considered well of a proper basis of a financial system in this country, in regard to this article. I do not refer to gentlemen who have heretofore been considered protectionists, but to the advocates of free trade; and those to whom I refer are of opinion that it would be more beneficial to the railroad interests, and bring a more certain relief to the companies engaged at present in the construction of railroads, and who have not yet bought their iron, to reduce the duty, say to twenty per cent., rather than to repeal it altogether. Whether their opinions will be confirmed by the judgment of those who are immediately interested in the manufacture of railroad iron, I do not know directly; but from the information which I have received from gentlemen with whom I have conversed on this subject, I am led to believe that the manufacturers of railroad iron in the United States, who are now making it at the rate of eighty thousand tons per annum, could get on with a duty of twenty per cent. I believe some of them have so said; but if the duty were totally repealed, they would be compelled to abandon the business altogether. If that be a true view of the case, the question is whether the railroad companies will at last be substantially benefited by a total repeal, or even a suspension of the duty for so long a time. I do not go into the question as to how far a total repeal will benefit those capitalists who have undertaken to construct railroads as a matter of speculation and profit only; but I refer to all those interests in railroads, whether now being constructed or only proposed to be constructed, by the farmers, planters, and others, upon the routes of the roads which are projected; small subscribers who are not to be considered in any light as capitalists; and the question is, whether their interests, too, would not be more substantially benefited by a material reduction of the duty than by its total repeal.

I have already announced that I am ready, cheerfully, to do something for the relief of those interested in roads that are in course of construction and not completed, and which have been embarrassed by the increased prices of labor as well as of iron within the last few years; but I think we ought to consider maturely what is the best way in which we can relieve them. If we repeal the duty, the question to be inquired into by the Senate and by Congress is, whether we would thereby bring any substantial relief to these interests, and whether they might not be subjected to higher prices by the monopolizing policy of the English manufacturers. The occurrence of a general war in Europe may change the reasoning upon this part of the subject; for if there were a general war in Europe, the demand on that continent for railroad iron would no doubt be diminished; and if this country should continue in peace with Great Britain, railroad iron might fall materially in price. But, sir, if there shall be no war in Europe, with the high price of labor in this country at this time, and in England too—because there has been a great appreciation of labor there as well as here—we are to consider whether, by repealing the duty and annihilating our own manufactures, we should not run the risk of having to pay the existing duty, should it be repealed, by an addition to the price of English rails.

I believe the price of railroad iron in England is now about £8 or £8 10s. per ton. Would not the result of a repeal of duty be to raise it to £9 or £10. The increase might not be immediate; but as soon as the English manufacturers shall perceive that all engaged in the United States in making railroad iron had abandoned the business, would not a rise in their prices certainly follow? It is not probable that a rise would take place immediately; for British manufacturers study their interests so closely that they never pursue an impolitic course. The rise in price would not immediately follow; but they would wait until the manufacturers of railroad iron in this country were prostrated, and then we would probably find that the railroad interest in this country had gained nothing.

I am ready to concur in some measure which will give substantial relief to this interest; but if we cannot get a reduction of duty to twenty per cent. I think, according to the reasoning of the memorialist from Tennessee, to whom I have alluded, it would be better to suspend the collection, say for three years after the roads shall have been put in operation from one terminus to the other. If that cannot be done, and it be the sentiment of the Senate that we had better suspend the duty for five or six years, I should be constrained by the interests which I represent to go with the gentleman from Illinois on this subject.

I have thrown out these suggestions for the purpose of showing that this is a subject which requires mature consideration, in every aspect of the question, and that we cannot safely decide it upon such considerations as may be given it in one or two mornings.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Reference has been so often made to the state of things in Europe as a reason why this proposition should not prevail, that I must briefly notice the suggestion made by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Maryland upon that point. They have referred to the fact that, in consequence of the probable existence of a state of war over the continent of Europe, our American stocks have fallen in the European market; and they seem to infer in some way, I hardly know on what ground, that this is a reason why this step should not be taken. Sir, it strikes me that, as far as it is proper for that consideration to have any effect on this bill, it is a very decided argument in its favor; for it is well known that the railroad iron which we import for the purpose of carrying on our railroad system is usually paid for by the sale of American stocks in the European market; and if a state of things has taken place since those railroads were commenced by which our stocks have been depreciated in the market, at the same time that the cost of railroad iron has been nearly doubled in price, it would seem to be a reason why the duty should be removed, in order that the stocks may not be further depressed, and the expense of finishing the roads may not be still further enhanced.

Then, sir, an argument has been suggested by the Senator from California, and perhaps by others, that there is something unfair in allowing railroad iron to come in free for the making of roads which are now in progress, inasmuch as those just completed have paid duty on their iron. I wish to call the attention of that Senator and of the Senate to the fact, that at the time the roads to which he refers were made, the price of railroad iron ranged perhaps from forty to fifty dollars a ton, instead of being, as it is now, from seventy to seventy-five dollars. If my amendment be adopted, and the bill, thus amended, be passed, the railroad iron for the completion of the roads now under construction will come in free of duty, but still the iron will cost them more than it costs those who have completed their road, even when they paid the duty. When, therefore, we come to look at the existing state of facts, we find that this argument vanishes upon a closer examination of the case.

I do not see that there is the slightest probability that the price of railroad iron will be much reduced in the market during the time that this suspension of duty is to operate. It is now up to the highest point. It is up to a point so high that the remission of the duties cannot, in any way, prejudice the interests of the manufacturers of that article. It is up to that point which, by any rules of protection, for which some contend, the duty still would not be necessary in order to enable our manufacturing establishments to continue successfully in their operations. I see no reason for believing that the price is to diminish within the next three years; and you must bear in mind that my proposition is only for three years, from the first of July next. If the European war goes on, there is no reason to believe that the price will be reduced. If the war does not go on, there is no reason to believe that it will, because the present price arose out of facts in existence before the probabilities of war arose.

But, sir, the Senator from Maryland has asked why I fixed the first of July last as the day for the commencement of this system. It was simply for the reason that it was necessary to fix some time. If I had fixed the first of January last, he might have asked with the same propriety why that day was named, or why any one day more than another. It was necessary to fix some day; and I went back to the first of July last, because that was about the period at which the price of railroad iron got up nearly to its maximum.

Mr. PRATT. My inquiry was why the honorable Senator should desire to give any retroactive effect to the measure at all? Our ordinary legislation is to go into effect from the time the law passes. My difficulty was, not that last July should have been fixed, but why the provision should be retrospective at all?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer the Senator upon that point. It was necessary to fix some period, according to my idea, and I fixed July last because that was the time when the price of railroad iron was approaching to about its maximum; and it has continued at a very high price since then. I know the increase commenced prior to that period.

I thought it necessary to go back somewhat for another reason: a large amount of iron has been approaching our shores, and is ready to be laid down; and a great deal of it is now in bond, but has not been laid down. I think it proper to extend the provision so as to apply to this, as well as to that which may arrive within the next few days. This iron has been bought under these increased prices; and coming in under the increased prices, I think it right to extend the operation of the provision back so as to cover it.

My object is to enable the railroads now in process of construction, or which have been commenced, to be completed. If a pecuniary revulsion is to come, as gentlemen predict, is it not wise that we should secure the completion of these roads, if possible, so that they shall not be a total loss? It will relieve us very much against the severity of such a crisis if these roads can be put in such a position that their stock will be available, and some assurance given that it will not be a total loss. The apprehension of a pecuniary crisis is, therefore, a very strong argument in favor of the passage of this measure, if there is no insuperable objection to it on other grounds.

Mr. BADGER. It has been asked, sir, what difference would be made as to the North Carolina railroad, if the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Illinois should be adopted, and the bill be passed, as it should be passed, now, or a month hence? I answer, none in the world; but then we have another alternative. Suppose that is not passed, and the proposition offered by that Senator does not meet the approbation of the Senate; it becomes, then, a matter of supreme importance, if it is to be of any value to the State which I represent, that the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance shall be passed at once. We have an immense amount of iron now in bond. It ought to be laid down. The company expect, in the course of a fortnight or three weeks, four thousand tons more. What are they to do? Let the iron remain in bond and suspend operations upon the road, waiting for the prospect of passing this bill? One great end of the substitute in the shape reported from the Committee on Finance was, by giving to that company and all others which should be in the like situation, an opportunity of obtaining the credit to enable them to proceed at once to lay down the iron without paying the duty. It is obvious that if the bill is to remain in that shape, time, so far as the matter of relief is concerned, is the very essence of the measure.

Now, sir, a few words with regard to the time of postponement; for I intend to confine myself to the question before the Senate, and not to discuss the general merits of the bill. The motion now pending before the Senate, if I understand it, is the motion to postpone until to-morrow.

Mr. PRATT. No, sir; the question is, I believe, on my motion to postpone until Monday week.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to postpone until to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. The President says the question is on postponing the bill until to-morrow. I have already said that I have no objection to that postponement, because I think it is right. I think it is due to one of the honorable Senators from Pennsylvania, who is expected to be here to-day, and who expected to be here so as to have been in his place to-day, that he shall have an opportunity of being present at the discussion of this bill. I am opposed to the further postponement which the Senator from Maryland proposes, to Monday week, and I am opposed to it particularly and specially on account of the illustration which the Senator from California gave of the necessity of postponement. I do not think we ought always to postpone measures, because particular Senators may happen to be absent when they are under consideration.

The Senator from Maryland also mentioned that his colleague [Mr. PEARCE] was absent, and that his State was greatly interested in this matter. Sir, I parted from his colleague yesterday; we occupy lodgings in the same house; and I heard no intimation from him, certainly he expressed none to me, that he desired that there should be a postponement of the proposition which I announced that I intended to submit, to take up this bill. He suggested nothing of the kind; and I presumed, in fact, that my absent friend from Maryland was rather too reasonable to think that it would be fair and right that this measure should be postponed because he was going away, when he knew that I had asked that it should be taken up, because I was going away myself. I have no objection to a postponement until to-morrow, when, I hope, one of the Senators from Pennsylvania will be here, and have an opportunity of being heard, though I do object to a postponement until Monday week.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, it is known, I believe, by the Senate, that one Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COOPER] has been detained by severe illness, in the city of Philadelphia, but he contemplates being here to-morrow. I understand that the other Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] is also severely indisposed at Harrisburg, in his own State, but I hope he will be in his seat by the day indicated by me. My colleague [Mr. PEARCE] did not intimate to me his feelings in regard to this bill, and I only assumed on behalf of the State which he and I represent, that he would desire to be here during the discussion of a measure of so much importance to the great interests of that State. We have manufactories in our State for rolling this description of iron. We know that they will be broken up, and all the capital invested in them—some half a million of dollars perhaps—lost by the passage of the bill. I, therefore, knowing the regard which my colleague has for all the interests of his constituents, assumed that he would be desirous of being present when a measure so destructive of that interest was about to be passed.

Mr. SEWARD. You have one company in your State, I believe, having a capital of $1,000,000.

Mr. PRATT. There are many millions invested in the iron business in my State, but I spoke of a particular interest, that of making railroad iron. There is one company alone which, the Senator from New York says, has a capital of $1,000,000 invested in this interest; and that will be entirely destroyed by the passage of this bill. Now, is it right that, for the purpose of protecting the capitalists engaged in making these roads, who have entered on their construction for their individual interest and not for the public good—for I assume that capital seeks investment, not for public, but for individual advantage—is it right, I ask, that for this purpose, the millions of dollars invested for the purpose of making the iron to supply the roads should be stricken down by the vote of the Senate, and that, too, without preparation, and without the greatest interests of the country being represented here?

But I rose only for the purpose of saying that I think the Senator from North Carolina is wrong in supposing that the question is to be first taken upon the motion to postpone until to-morrow. I have moved, as a substitute, that the subject be postponed until Monday week. I believe, according to all parliamentary rule, the question is first taken upon the longest time. It is upon my motion to postpone until Monday week that the Senate have ordered the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has examined the rule. The motion first made is first to be put to the Senate. The motion made by the Senator from Michigan was to postpone until to-morrow. The motion made by the Senator from Maryland was to postpone to Monday week. Both motions being to postpone to a day certain, the motion first made is first to be put to the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. I beg to say a word in correction. I did not assume at all that my honorable friend from Maryland, who is absent, [Mr. PEARCE] was otherwise than deeply interested in attending to everything that belongs to the people of the honorable State which he represents on this floor. No doubt, sir, he feels the same deep interest that the Senator from Maryland, who is present, [Mr. PRATT] does, in whatever is entitled to his special attention and care. But what I meant to say was, that I did not understand from that Senator, knowing the situation in which I was placed, that he would desire me to forego the application to the Senate, of which I had before given notice, to take up this bill. Having said that, sir, in justice to an absent friend of whom I know that there is no interest under Heaven, which it is his duty to protect, which he is not prepared to protect by every means in his power, I wish to say a word as to the discrimination which the Senator from Maryland has drawn between the persons who are engaged in making railroads and the manufacturers of railroad iron. He says these railroad companies are engaged in prosecuting their enterprises for their own benefit, and not for the public good; and is it not enormous, he asks, that an advantage shall be given to them at the expense of the manufacturers of railroad iron? Now, I wish to know if the manufacturers of railroad iron are not also engaged in prosecuting their business for their own pecuniary benefit, and not for the public good? Am I to understand from the Senator from Maryland that the iron manufacturers in Maryland prosecute their business for the public good, and not for their private interest?

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator permit me to answer him?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I will answer both the questions of the Senator. I did not intimate, and no other member of the Senate, except the honorable Senator, understood me to intimate, that my colleague was less desirous of protecting the interests of his constituents than myself. Certainly no other Senator than the honorable Senator from North Carolina so understood me. The Senator said, and I agree with him, that he would not have been so unreasonable as to ask of the Senator his consent to the postponement of the bill. As I understood the Senator in his original speech, he said he had parted with my colleague last night; they boarded at the same house; and he had not indicated any wish upon the subject of this bill. That is all very true, I have no doubt. I stated, further, that he had indicated no wish to me upon the subject; but I thought I knew what his feelings and wishes would be, by supposing that I knew what were the interests and feelings of his constituents. I therefore do not choose to be put in the position of making an allegation here against the desire of my colleague to represent correctly the interests of his constituents.

Now, in regard to the other point. The sophistry of the argument of the honorable Senator will be perceived by every one who looks at it for a single moment. What did I say? That the capitalists engaged in making railroads had engaged in them for their self-interest. The Senator concedes it; but he says that my constituents who are engaged in making railroad iron are engaged in that, too, for their interest; and, he says, there is no distinction to be drawn between the two. Now, I submit to his own mind, which, when unbiased by prejudice, is as clear as anybody's, whether there is not this manifest difference: that my constituents, who have engaged in this business, have engaged in it by virtue of the law of the land, by which they were to receive the protection which you are about to take away; while his constituents, engaged in the making of roads for their interest, have engaged in it with equal knowledge of the law of the land that they were to pay the duty which his bill proposes to take off? That is the distinction.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, it is possible that I may not be able to perceive the clearness of the distinction. Now let us see how it is. The distinction which the Senator first stated was, that those concerned in railroads were engaged in prosecuting their enterprises for their own advantage, and not for the public good.

Mr. PRATT. That is true.

Mr. BADGER. Very well, sir. If that be the distinction, of course that must be the circumstance in which they differ from those who are engaged in manufacturing iron. He states a distinction between the two classes of cases, and he complains that one should be promoted at the expense of the other; and that distinction is, that the persons of one class are engaged in prosecuting their enterprises for their own private benefit, and not for the public good. Now, I ask if it does not result, if there is any propriety in the discrimination stated, that the persons of the other class are engaged in prosecuting their work for the public good? Why, clearly so. But now the Senator says he admits both are prosecuting their enterprises for their own benefit, and not for the public good. Then, in that respect, they stand on the same foundation. But he says those who are engaged in manufacturing iron undertook to manufacture it on the expectation that they would receive a certain amount of protection. True; but for what was the protection to be given? It was to put them on a footing with their European rivals. Now, as my friend from Illinois has stated this morning, the price of railroad iron, which was formerly from forty-five to fifty dollars a ton, has risen to be between seventy and eighty dollars a ton. Then the question is not whether these manufacturers shall retain the protection which they had, and which might have been just, necessary, and proper when foreign iron could be procured at forty-five or fifty dollars a ton; but whether it is right, just, and fair to the industrial pursuits of the country generally, that they shall retain the same amount of ratio of duty when railroad iron has risen up to seventy-five dollars a ton? The question, in other words, is, whether, when the foreign price of the article is such that they no longer need protection, they shall have a greater protection than they had when they did need it! That is the whole question.

But, Mr. President, although I assumed for the purpose of the argument, deeming it immaterial, that the two classes of persons stood upon the same footing, as each pursuing their own interest; and though it is true in regard to railroad companies that their ultimate interest must be the object with those who are chiefly engaged in them; yet it is also true, as we all know, that many persons make investments in railroad companies, at least in the southern country, not with the prospect or hope of making profit upon their investment, but of aiding in the general diffusion of prosperity to the country of which they are members, and trusting for their return, not to a particular pecuniary benefit from the individual road, but to their share in the common results of the prosperity which shall be diffused by it through the whole country in which they live. I have no doubt that it is so in other portions of the country. Therefore, it seems to me, to make the most of this case, that those gentlemen who are engaged in manufacturing iron no longer need the protective duty which they did when forty-five dollars a ton was paid for it; and hence it is not at all unfair or ungenerous, it is not what they should complain of at all, that these duties should be suspended for the purpose of aiding these struggling roads, the proprietors of which are straining every nerve to raise money to accomplish the establishment of these great thoroughfares of quick travel through the country, and who, though they may seek their own individual benefit, and their own alone, can only accomplish it by doing a great good to the country in the successful prosecution of their respective enterprises.

Sir, it has been said that you will thereby allow roads, without paying duty, to be put into successful competition with other railroads. The remarks of my friend from Illinois have shown that it will only put the roads now being made upon a footing with the old ones; but suppose it were otherwise; is there any harm in competition? Is a railroad monopoly no evil? Have we not found it to be one of the greatest of evils? Is it not an evil to travelers to subject them to the exactions of a single company without opposition? Is it not an evil to the Government? Have we not found it to be so? Have not these roads been able to dictate their own terms for the transportation of the mail? What harm will arise to us if we have lines of competition? Conveyances are improved, prices are lessened, conveniences are increased, and every advantage is secured by getting rid of an entire monopoly, and giving us the advantage which always results from fair and full competition. So that, in any respect, I do not see that the measure is liable to the objection. I am sorry, however, that I was drawn into making these remarks on the subject. I hope the question will be taken on the postponement.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into the merits of this question; nor do I intend to advert to the matter of protection in reference to the provisions of this bill; but the proposition now before the Senate, whether you take the amendment of the honorable Senator from Illinois or the bill reported from the Committee on Finance, is a proposition to make a partial revision of the tariff system of the United States for the purpose of conferring a bounty, not only prospectively, but retrospectively, upon particular railroads of this country. That is the proposition in point of truth and fact. It is to confer a bounty, prospectively, and also retrospectively, to the 1st of July last, on particular railroad companies of the United States. Sir, I am opposed to this principle of legislation. I do not desire to see the tariff revised in a partial mode. I think it does require revision. I have understood that that question was before the Committee on Finance, and I had hoped that even before this time they would have favored us with their views of a general system of revision.

I can conceive of a great variety of questions which would necessarily arise in reference to the proper revision of the tariff if you assume the principle, for which I contend, that the principle of raising a sufficient amount of revenue under a tariff is the true principle to make the basis upon which that tariff is to be adjusted. But in order fairly to adjust a tariff upon that basis you must have the whole of it before you. Are there no other interests in the country than railroads? If you are to exempt them from the payment of duties, and leave the existing duties standing on a variety of other interests which may equally call on you for a revision of the tariff, how are you to measure the amount of that revision until you have the whole subject before you? I am opposed to this bill not on that ground alone, but I am opposed to it because of its whole bearing upon the revenue. It is a partial revision of an important system, and ought to be fully discussed before a bill of this character is passed. The notice given by the honorable Senator from North Carolina was given on Friday last. The bill was brought up to-day with the hope of having it passed here to-day or to-morrow. I think it a bill of far more importance than many others which have taken a much longer time in discussion, and which have created a much wider and deeper agitation throughout the country. Nay, sir, I think the aspects of this very bill, one particularly, connect themselves with other matters which have been agitated throughout the country; and if you refer to the existing state of things in Pennsylvania, I can easily see that a connection will be sought to be made between this and another bill. I desire, before this bill shall be passed, that it shall, at least, be amply discussed before the Senate.

I believe, myself, that the tariff ought to be revised; but I think that, to revise it justly, on the principle which I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if he were here, could not deny, the cardinal object should be to look to revenue as the basis on which it should be adjusted. You cannot do that unless you have the whole subject before you. You must have the whole interest of the country before you, and all the duties which you are going to impose before you; or, otherwise, in exempting a particular interest from the operations of the existing law, which was passed after great deliberation; and exempting it without regard to the pressure arising from the rise of price on many other interests of the country, you are disposing partially of a general subject which will ultimately lead to a conflict, which deranges and prevents a fair adjustment of the whole system. For this reason I am not only opposed to the particular bill, but I think even if it be passed, it ought to be more fully discussed than it can be at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ADAMS in the chair.) The question is, shall the bill under consideration be postponed until to-morrow?

Mr. PRATT. I hope the Senate will vote down that motion, and then take the question on the longer postponement which I propose.

Mr. STUART. When I submitted the motion to postpone until to-morrow, it was on the supposition that we should be able to do some other business to-day. I have abandoned that expectation now, and therefore I withdraw my motion.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday week, and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Bright, Butler, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Iowa, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Hamlin, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Slicell, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toucey, Weller, Williams, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Brown, Clay, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Morton, Shields, and Walker—9.

So the motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is now too late in the day to do any thing in Executive session. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MASON. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Bright, Brown, Cass, Chase, Clay, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hamlin, Morton, Pettit, Seward, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Walker, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Butler, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Geyer, Gwin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Slicell, Toucey, Weller, and Williams—21.

So the motion was agreed to; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 11, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, in response to the resolution of the House of the 3d instant, calling for copies of all correspondence that may have taken place between the Government of the United States and that of Spain in relation to the refusal by the authorities of the Island of Cuba, some time in the summer of 1852, to permit the United States mail steamer Crescent City to land the mail or the passengers destined for that Island in Havana, stating that copies of the correspondence called for had been transmitted to the House in response to a former resolution of that body.

Mr. HAVEN. I move that the communication be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. DEAN. All similar communications have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I hope this will take that direction.

Mr. HAVEN. I will not insist upon my motion, if it is not in accordance with the usual course.

The communication was therefore referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were signed by the Speaker:

H. R. No. 202. An act for the relief of Hezekiah Johnson, of the town of Bridgewater, in the State of Vermont;

H. R. No. 127. An act for the relief of James F. Green;

H. R. No. 170. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Lieutenant John E. Bispham;

H. R. No. 54. An act for the relief of Madison Parton;

H. R. No. 179. An act for the relief of Emelie Hooe, widow of Captain Hooe;

H. R. No. 194. An act to provide a pension for Silas Champion, of Genesee county, State of New York;

H. R. No. 177. An act for the relief of Lyman N. Cook;

H. R. No. 201. An act for the relief of Aaron Stafford;

H. R. No. 193. An act for the relief of Alton Nelson;

H. R. No. 166. An act to establish additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota; and

H. R. No. 124. An act for the relief of Lemuel Hudson.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a bill granting lands equally to the several States to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the support of schools, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I would ask the unanimous consent of the House for the introduction of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be requested to inquire into the propriety of publishing such part of the Census of 1850 as relates to vital and mortality statistics for distribution among the medical faculty of the United States.

There was no objection; and the resolution was introduced and adopted.

Mr. HIESTER. I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution, which is one merely of inquiry.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Does the time consumed in the introduction of these resolutions come out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I object.

Mr. HIESTER. If the resolution be read I am sure the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw my objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to this House such information concerning the frauds on the Pension Office, mentioned in the late annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and any other similar frauds which may have since been discovered, as will exhibit the nature and extent thereof.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, introduced joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in reference to cheap postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN GUSMAN, OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. NICHOLS. I would ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report back from the Committee on Private Land Claims Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of John Gusman, of Louisiana."

Mr. BOCKOCK. What peculiar importance is there in that bill that it should be reported before other bills in the hands of members of the standing committees?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to be permitted to report back the bill from the Committee on Public Lands. What disposition does the gentleman from Ohio propose to make of the bill?

Mr. NICHOLS. The bill merely proposes to confirm a land title. It has passed the Senate twice, and has been carefully examined by the Committee on Private Land Claims. It merits consideration, and I hope that the House will act upon it now.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, the investigation of the bill will be gone into now.

Mr. KERR, and several other MEMBERS, objected.

Mr. NICHOLS. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Half a dozen gentlemen object.

Mr. NICHOLS. Then, sir, if objection is made, I move to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I would respectfully ask the permission of the House to have that bill put upon its passage. Its passage is asked by the Committee on Private Land Claims. It has passed the Senate twice, and has been reported favorably upon by the Committee on Public Lands in the House. It is a claim which is also recommended by the Land Office. The gentleman interested is a creole, who knows very little of our language. He is here with his family at much expense, and has been here for some time, and the bill simply proposes to correct a little informality in respect to his title.

I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill. The Representative of the claimant is obliged to leave the city, and when the bill comes up there will be no one from the State of Louisiana, who has examined the case, to give that explanation which I am prepared to give now.

Mr. BENNETT. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the bill reported by me from the Committee on Public Lands was postponed till this morning. I have been requested by several members to ask a further postponement of the consideration of that bill for two weeks, and I am willing that it shall be so postponed, if it is the unanimous wish of the House.

The amendment which has been proposed to it is one that will undoubtedly give rise to discussion, and occupy some time. If it is the unanimous consent of the House to postpone it for two weeks, the gentleman from Louisiana can go on with his bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York proposes to postpone the further consideration of the bill first in order, being the bill reported by himself from the Committee on Public Lands, until this day two weeks. If there is no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. What is the order proposed?

The SPEAKER. The postponement for two weeks of this bill.

Mr. WARREN. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill reported by the gentleman from New York from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object to its further postponement. It has been postponed once already.

The SPEAKER. Then the question will be upon postponing it.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope it will be postponed. That will suit the views of the gentleman from New York, and will certainly suit mine. My amendment will come up at the same time as the bill, and we are both obliged to be absent from the city. I therefore hope the House will consent to the postponement of the bill.

Mr. DEAN. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That motion is now pending; but the motion to postpone to a day certain takes precedence.

Mr. DEAN. I understood that the Speaker did not entertain that motion the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman misunderstood the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to inquire whether the question is on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. No; it is on postponing the bill for two weeks. That is the question, and it must be first put to the House.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to know if it is not in order to move now to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair states again that that motion is already pending.

Mr. WARREN. That is the disposition I desire to be made of the bill.

The SPEAKER. But the motion to postpone to a day certain takes precedence by express rule of the House.

Mr. McMULLIN. I would respectfully suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] that he name a later period for the postponement. I would ask the Chair if it is not competent for him to do so?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for him to name a later period; and the question would be first taken on the latest period named.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. As I understand it, the gentleman from New York will be absent from the city after the period named by him.

Mr. McMULLIN. And I shall be absent at the period of time he indicates.

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman from Virginia propose to which the consideration of the bill shall be postponed?

Mr. McMULLIN. I propose the first day of June.

Mr. BENNETT. That period would be extremely inconvenient for me.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I think it best to move to postpone it until after the Nebraska bill is acted upon. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, as the gentleman from Illinois must be aware.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill until the fifteenth day of July next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. KERR. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 65, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Barksdale, Benton, Bockock, Boyce, Bridges, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmundson, Elliott, Ellison, English, Fuller, Goode, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hibbard, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Knox, Lane, Latham, Lindsley, Maxwell, May, Smith Miller, Nichols, Olds, Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Sapp, Shaw, Shower, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, David Stuart, Vansant, Walker, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Chandler, Chase, Churchill, Corwin, Crocker, Culum, Thomas Davis, Dickinson, Edmonds, Etheridge, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Goodrich, Grey, Andrew J. Harlan, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Hiester, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Kurtz, Letcher, Lindsey, McMullin, Mace, Mayall, Meacham, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Peck, John Perkins, Pratt, Ready, Riddle, David Ritchie, Rowe, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Seymour, Skelton, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Restor L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Upham, Vail, Wade, Israel Washburn, and Zollieffer—76.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

After the call of the vote, Mr. MURRAY stated that if he had been within the bar of the House he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. STRATTON also stated that if he had been present he should have voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to postpone the consideration of the bill to this day two weeks; and the gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out this day two weeks, and insert in lieu thereof "the first day of June."

The question will be first upon the latter motion.

Mr. ASHE. Would it be in order to move to postpone the consideration of the bill indefinitely?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order until the pending motions to postpone to a day certain, and to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, are first disposed of. Then the motion to postpone indefinitely can be made, which, if carried, would be tantamount to a rejection of the bill.

The question was then taken on Mr. McMULLIN's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BENNETT's motion; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed till this day two weeks.

Mr. PERKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the consideration of the bill was postponed this day two weeks, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN GUSMAN.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the request made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] that the Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of John Gusman, of Louisiana," which was reported back from the Committee on Private Land Claims, be received and disposed of by the House. If there be no objection, the bill will be ordered to a third reading.

The bill was then read a third time in extenso.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to know something more in relation to the bill just read, and ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his demand for the previous question, so as to enable me to ask for information.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio consent to withdraw his demand for the previous question?

Mr. NICHOLS. Yes; I withdraw it for the purpose of answering the inquiries of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make one or two inquiries in relation to the bill before the House; and first, I desire to know from the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS,] or from the gentleman representing the Committee on Private Land Claims, [Mr. NICHOLS,] whether there has been any legal proceedings in the courts of justice in regard to this bill?

Mr. NICHOLS. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from New York. This bill, Mr. Speaker, belongs to a class of claims in Louisiana for which Congress, some years since, passed various acts allowing confirmation, under which many similar claims were confirmed. But in this case, by the laches of the parties in interest, who were probably unaware of the necessity for such confirmation, it never was confirmed. Subsequently an act was passed by Congress authorizing courts of justice—the courts of the United States—to take cognizance of a certain class of claims in Louisiana. By virtue of that act of Congress this case was presented to the courts for confirmation, but it was never tried upon its merits. The courts there decided that the act allowing the courts to take cognizance of this certain class of claims did not cover the class of cases where the lands were held by possession only, and not by written evidence of title derived from the United States. This, I understand, was the point on which the court made its decision.

The lands claimed by the petitioner, and confirmed to him by this bill, have been in the undisputed possession of the party asking for confirmation for nearly half a century. This body—the House of Representatives—has reported at a former session in favor of relief, and the Senate has reported in favor of relief. But when we came on here at this session we found among the papers in the committee room of the private land claims, reports regularly drawn, confirming the title, but which had not been submitted to this body at the last Congress for want of time.

Mr. HAVEN. I have another question to ask in relation to this bill. I would like to know if the sole basis on which this claim is founded is the lengthened possession of thirty-odd years in which it has been in the hands of the claimants?

Mr. NICHOLS. The party in interest, under the bill, holds by an original purchase, in which a consideration was paid.

Mr. HAVEN. Was there a purchase and payment?

Mr. NICHOLS. There was an original purchase made from a tribe of Indians, who were the owners at the time, and had possession, under whom this party claims, and from whom he purchased long before the United States came in possession of the Louisiana purchase.

Mr. HAVEN. How many acres were there?

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PERKINS] can better answer that question than I can.

Mr. PERKINS. I answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] that I cannot state the precise number of acres. It is more a question of principle. The land is not valuable, being mostly pine wood. On one portion of it there is a brick-yard; and that, I believe, gives the tract most of its value.

The population of that section were mostly French, who were not familiar with our laws and customs. The possession has been continuous, and the Land Office reports have been in favor of it; the Senate has passed it, and, without hesitation, the committee in this House unanimously ask its passage. It is a simple informality that the bill is intended to remedy.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not desire to detain the House on this subject. I would have preferred the bill if it had been in a shape conforming with previous legislation, authorizing the claimant to make his claim in the same manner as though he had held under a written agreement or instrument. But, under the explanation of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS,] I make no opposition to the bill.

Mr. NICHOLS. I renew my motion for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The main question being, "Shall the bill pass?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that motion for a moment, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] if he will not consent to postpone the special order which is in order this morning, inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] desires to address the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman from Alabama will not postpone it longer, will he consent to postpone it one or two hours?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope he will postpone it for two weeks.

Mr. COBB. I am perfectly willing to oblige any gentleman as to the time of postponement. I consider the matter so plain that it certainly will pass when it shall be considered. I am perfectly willing to postpone it for two weeks, but with the understanding that we shall go on with the morning hour.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object to postponing it for two weeks. It has already been postponed once.

Mr. COBB. Then I am disposed to accommodate the gentleman, and as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] wishes to speak this morning, I move to postpone the consideration of the special order until two o'clock to-day.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I now insist upon the regular order of business.

On motion by Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Jonathan Syter, for the purpose of referring them to the Pension Office.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EDGERTON. I call for the yeas and nays. I want to see who will vote to deprive us of the morning hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If we wait for that, the gentleman from Tennessee will not have his hour to speak in committee. I hope we shall go into committee now.

Mr. HAMILTON. How long before the morning hour will be out?

The SPEAKER. In twenty minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is not a long time enough to make it worth while to call the yeas and nays on.

Mr. OLDS. It is very important that we should have those twenty minutes. I hope we shall have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. OLDS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and Mr. CAMPBELL's motion agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FULLER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 48) "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855."

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] was upon the floor, and is now entitled to the same.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. CULLOM, after preliminary remarks, said that when he left Tennessee he had not dreamed that he should be called upon to participate in the vexed question which has sprung on the House by the bill to organize territorial governments for Nebraska and Kansas. He came hither to participate in the legislation necessary to our common country. The honest claims of hundreds of our citizens are to be postponed, ruled out of court; the stream of legislation is to be dammed up by this nefarious project, which he intended to denounce as a work of politicians, to strangle the legislation of the country for personal aggrandizement. He believed, in the face of God, that he should be a coward if he did not denounce it. He should not be a Tennessean if he did not denounce this plot against the peace and quiet of the Union. Yes, Nebraska and Kansas, and Kansas and Nebraska, is the hue and cry. These Halls are made vocal with the sound of these cant phrases; and we are told that territorial governments must forthwith be given them; and the compromise of 1820, the work of our fathers, completed in times of great public excitement, when the Union of these States was in jeopardy, is to be repudiated and trampled under foot.

This is a naked question of repudiation or no repudiation. You may, he said, talk to me about bad faith and outraged southern honor, but I tell you the North and the South, the East and the West, that this is a naked question, whether the sons, the descendants of our patriotic fathers, who pledged their honor on a great and momentous question, will repudiate their solemn obligations on a mere quibble and plea.

The question had been sprung on him like a fire-bell at midnight. Where, he asked, was the voice of the people, North or South, asking for the passage of this measure, thus to bring the North and South by the ears, and reopen the fountain of bitter waters and the agitations which had well nigh severed this Union?

The measure came from a defeated presidential aspirant—defeated in 1850. This was the starting point, and should be known from Maine to the Pacific. Where are the South? Where have they been? Sleeping on their watchtower for thirty-four years? Was it necessary that they should be waked up to their interests by your big or little giants? [Laughter.] He [Senator DOUGLAS] is the great Sanhedrim of the State of Illinois, [laughter,] overshadowing everything. He has out-heroded Herod, and out-southered the South.

He referred to the fact that Senator DOUGLAS, in 1849, 1850, and in 1854, regarded the Missouri compromise as a binding contract, but now proposes to repeal it. The "Union," which denounced such a purpose, soon afterwards seized upon it as a means of nationalizing the Administration.

He denied that the North has repudiated the Missouri compact, and asked for the proof. It could not be shown.

He spoke of the provisions of the bill, which, he contended, does not contain the principle of non-intervention which is claimed for it; and, in conclusion, he defended the Missouri compromise, and eulogized and vindicated the memory of Tennesseans who sustained and assisted in the passage of that measure. The men of 1854 who rise here and asperse their character shall always find in him a vindicator.

[His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. PHILLIPS obtained the floor.

Mr. COBB. I believe the floor has been assigned to my colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] but as the time is so near when, by the order of the House, we must take up the special order, with his permission I will now make the motion to take up House bill No. 1, the title of which is as follows:

A bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, and to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands.

I trust that every member of the committee will sustain the motion I have made.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour fixed by the House having arrived for the consideration of the bill designated by the gentleman from Alabama, the bill comes up without a motion.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, by the resolution of the House, closing debate in the Committee of the Whole on the homestead bill, debate was also terminated on the bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands. It was my anxious desire to express fully the views which I entertain in reference to the all-important question of graduating and reducing the price of the public lands; but I am precluded from doing so under the five-minute rule. I anticipated having such an opportunity, but it has not been afforded to me. The bill is now open to amendment; and I must, under the circumstances, submit to the rules. I shall propose such amendments as will, in my judgment, carry out more completely the object contemplated by the bill. The bill, as originally reported by me, embraced the homestead policy as well as that for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands. I shall now move that the provision for homesteads be entirely stricken out. When that amendment shall have been disposed of, I will move two or three others for the purpose of making the bill conform to what I believe to be the intention and wishes of the majority of the House. I do not desire to discuss this measure now. I can only briefly call the attention of members to its great importance.

The question of graduating and reducing the price of the public land is one which has had the consideration of Congress, from time to time, so far back as my recollection goes. If twenty-five or thirty years ago the necessity for graduating and reducing the price of the public land was apparent to the country, is it not more so now? Does not each and every individual feel the force of the argument that the public domain should be sold for such price as will encourage settlement and cultivation? Inasmuch as we cannot enter into a general discussion, I trust that the bill will be fairly considered. In doing so, I am satisfied members will arrive at but one conclusion; and that is, the necessity of reducing the price of lands which have remained unsold in market for forty or fifty years. Would it be the policy of an individual who had held up his real estate for a number of years at $1 25 per acre, to still refuse to sell at such a price as the land would command in the market, and thus lose all interest upon his money?

Mr. SAGE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. COBB. What is the object proposed by the rising of the committee?

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the gentleman move to rise that the bill may be reported to the House?

Mr. SAGE. My motion is a simple one. When the committee rise, I shall move that the House adjourn.

Mr. COBB. It is too early for the House to adjourn yet awhile. I trust, before rising, the committee will consider and act on the bill now before it.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to make this remark, and this remark only: I trust that the House will make such a disposition of the bill as will enable those who are friendly to it to offer their reasons at length. It is my purpose to attack the bill; but before I make that attack, I desire to hear all that gentlemen have to say in its favor.

Mr. SAGE. I did not know that this matter would come before the committee to-day, and I would like to have an opportunity to look into the provisions of the bill. With that object, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to make one inquiry of the Chair. Is not the five-minute discussion now the order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HAMILTON. On the special order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, on the special order.

Mr. HAMILTON. We cannot get rid of this bill in any way. It must be considered until it is disposed of. If we rise now, and then go back into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will still be the order of the day, and you cannot avoid it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The order of the House is that it shall be considered from day to day until disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. DISNEY. As I intend, also, to attack the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] proposing a general distribution of the public lands, and as I desire to say grace over the whole lot, and not be making separate speeches in relation to each of these measures, I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the same day to which the bill of the gentleman from New York has been postponed.

Mr. COBB. That motion is clearly not in order.

Mr. HAMILTON. The committee can make no such order as that. We are acting under a special order of the House.

Mr. COBB. I would also remind the gentleman that that measure is before the House; this before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. That makes no difference.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. But the committee has no power to make any such order as that proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COBB. None in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so rules. The Chair is of opinion that the motion is not in order.

Mr. COBB. I was perfectly willing that the special order should be postponed this morning; but gentlemen objected to its postponement, and now we must go on with it.

Mr. HESTER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he should move that the committee do now rise, for the purpose of submitting his motion to postpone in the House.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. He cannot do it in the House even without unanimous consent; and of course there will be objection.

Mr. HESTER. There will probably be no objection.

Mr. SAGE. I must insist on my motion for the committee to rise. Many members in this part of the Hall, like myself, were not aware that this question would come up to-day, and are not prepared to consider it. Besides that, it is evident there is barely a quorum here. I hope the committee will rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman submit that motion?

Mr. SAGE. I do, sir.

Mr. COBB. I hope it will not be agreed to. We can gain nothing whatever by it.

Mr. HAMILTON. There is no use whatever in rising. You cannot postpone this special order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SAGE. I call for tellers on my motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then put; and on a division, there were—ayes 21, noes 29; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no quorum present, the roll must be called.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Cannot we have tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. No; tellers have been refused.

The roll was then called, and the names of the absentees noted.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No 1, and having found itself without a quorum, had directed the names of the absentees to be noted, and the Chairman to report the same to the House.

The SPEAKER. There being a quorum now present—123 gentlemen having answered to their names—the Chairman will again resume the chair. The Chairman resumed the chair.

Mr. COBB. I think I can make a suggestion to which the committee will agree unanimously. The committee is very thin, and the bill under consideration is a very important one, which gentlemen would like to examine more fully. I propose, then, that the committee rise, with the view that the House may receive such reports from the standing committees as will not give rise to debate. I hope that no gentleman will object to this course of proceeding, for, by so doing, we will greatly facilitate business. I move, therefore, that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 1, being "a bill to grant homesteads and to graduate and reduce the price of public lands," but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. COBB. I now move that the committees be called upon for reports that may give rise to no debate.

Mr. HAMILTON. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to mean that committees shall be called upon in their regular order?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to empower the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco according to time, upon which the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. HAMILTON. That bill comes up as business in the morning hour. Is it now in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is in order, because the morning hour had not expired; and in the absence of any motion to go to any other business, it would be in order.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, has the previous question been demanded on that proposition?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been demanded.

Mr. HAMILTON. As the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] who has charge of the bill, is not in his seat, I desire in his absence to make a few remarks in reference to it. In doing so I will not encroach long upon the time of the House.

Mr. HAVEN. Would it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order if the gentleman from Maryland, who has the floor, choose to make such motion, or if he would yield the floor for the purpose of permitting it to be made.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desired to make a few remarks in relation to this bill. I did not intend to make a speech or to encroach upon the time of the House; but as the gentleman from Tennessee is not here, I should be perfectly satisfied if the further consideration of the bill were postponed.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I perceive the embarrassment under which the gentleman from Maryland and the House generally labor. In order to relieve it, therefore, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has the floor; and the motion cannot be made unless he yields the floor for that purpose.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion to adjourn, in order to permit me to make a motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, with a view to the taking up of the bills there and having them referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. DISNEY. Certainly; I do so with pleasure.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am satisfied with that.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to go to the business on the Speaker's table?

Mr. COBB. I trust the House will go on as at present for half an hour or quarter of an hour longer, until the time arrives for going to the business on the Speaker's table. How much of the morning hour still remains, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. There are five minutes of the morning hour still unexpired.

Mr. COBB. Well, if that is all, I will not object to going to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the House will allow the committees to make reports. Reports have been accumulating here upon us for weeks without the committees having had an opportunity to present them; and what is the use now of referring more bills to committees when they cannot report those on hand?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Virginia is rather late in making his objection.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not object at all, Mr. Speaker. I simply put it to the House as a plain practical matter of fact business, what is the use of referring bills, when the committee's hands are already full of business which they have not had an opportunity of reporting on?

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The SPEAKER. The first bill in order upon the Speaker's table is House bill "for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army," which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I know, Mr. Speaker, what the amendment is, and move that the House concur in it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment:

The amendment was accordingly read, as follows:

"At the end of the bill, add the following words: 'under sixteen years of age.'"

The bill, as amended, will read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, required to place the name of the said Mary Deany on the pension roll, and cause to be paid to her the sum of fifteen dollars per month for the term of ten years, commencing January 1st, 1853: Provided, That in case of the marriage or death of the said Mary Deany, the pension hereby granted to her shall be paid to her two children, or to the survivor of them under sixteen years of age."

Mr. HAVEN. I move the previous question upon the concurrence in that amendment.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. EDGERTON. Is it in order now to move to commit that bill to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, as the main question has been ordered to be put.

Mr. EDGERTON. Will it be in order to move to refer it to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to make any motion. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MIDDLESWARTH. I wish to make an inquiry of the Speaker. Is it intended by the Senate amendment, when the widow dies, to extend the pension to the children?

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate confines the pension to children under sixteen years of age.

The main question being, "Shall the amendment be concurred in?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed sundry private bills.]

The next bill upon the Speaker's table was then reported by its title:

A bill for the relief of William B. Edwards.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill, to which the Senate have made an amendment. The bill provides that the name of William B. Edwards shall be placed upon the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the first of January, 1854. The Senate's amendment is to correct a mere clerical error, which is to strike out "1854" and insert in lieu thereof "1850."

The question was put; and the Senate amendment was concurred in.

The following bills were then taken up, and read a first and second time by their titles respectively, and referred as indicated below:

An act to constitute Keokuk and Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, ports of delivery—Committee on Commerce.

An act to promote the efficiency of the Army, by retiring disabled officers—Committee on Military Affairs.

An act to regulate the fees and compensation of the district attorneys in the courts of the United States for the Territories of Minnesota, New Mexico, and Utah—Committee on the Judiciary.

An act to authorize the issue of registers to vessels owned by the Accessory Transit Company—Committee on Commerce.

An act to authorize the issue of patents of land in any State or Territory in certain cases—Committee on Public Lands.

An act to establish post roads in the State of California—Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

INDIANA AND ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD.

The bill granting to the States of Indiana and Illinois a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of the Indiana and Illinois Central railroad having been read a first and second time by its title,

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, said: I mean to make the motion that this bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I have the floor, and the gentleman cannot, therefore, submit the motion before moving to put the bill upon its passage; however, I desire to move to commit it to the Committee on Public Lands, so that it may be kept before the House, in case of an adjournment before it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The motion to commit will be entered.

Mr. LETCHER. I now move to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor upon the motion to commit the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not desire to press this question upon the consideration of the House at this time, but merely wish to make a remark or two before it is disposed of in any manner. I am aware that it is taking the bill out of what is perhaps the usual course to move to put it upon its passage at this time; but the Committee on Public Lands have agreed upon and now have a bill ready to report to the House precisely in the same language of that now before the House. As it therefore has the sanction of the Committee on Public Lands, I do not see any necessity of referring it to that committee for a report upon it. So much for that point.

I repeat, that I do not wish to press action upon the bill at this moment, unless it meet the approbation of the House. If, however, there is unanimous consent, or if it is the general wish of the House, I am willing to say what I have to say upon the measure. Or if the House prefer, I will defer it until some future time.

Several MEMBERS. Let it come up some other time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana make the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill to any day certain?

Mr. DAVIS. I am perfectly willing to make that motion, if I can be sure that it will come up at that time.

The SPEAKER. If that motion prevails, the bill will again take its place upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DAVIS. And will it come up in order when the House again resumes the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it will take its place in the fifth class of business upon the Speaker's table, if the House adjourns without disposing of it.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I do not so understand the rule; but I wish to be certain as to the point of order before I make any motion.

Mr. LETCHER rose.

Mr. DAVIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, if he has any suggestion to make.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana should go on and make his speech or make his motion, and let somebody else have a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I am entitled to the floor, and I suppose I may either go on and make my speech rapidly, or take my time for it. I wish, however, that the Chair would decide the question definitely, as to what will be the condition of the bill if it be now postponed to a day certain.

The SPEAKER. If the consideration of the bill be postponed to a day certain, it will come up in its present order on the Calendar when the House shall resume the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table. That will be the ruling of the Chair upon the subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I make the motion, then, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed for two weeks from this day.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House a motion to postpone to a day certain takes precedence of a motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion takes precedence of a motion to postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman submits a motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will be pending; and if the motion to postpone fails, the question will come up on that motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The motion to postpone to a day certain shuts out all amendments and debate.

Mr. JONES. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion that the bill be laid on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HESTER called for the reading of the bill. Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the House adjourned, at half past two o'clock, p. m., until to-morrow at twelve, m.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Laurence Taliaferro, praying a pension, on account of disease contracted in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Catherine Clark be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of John McVey be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Richard B. Mason be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT BURLINGTON.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a custom-house at Burlington, in the State of Vermont.

CORRESPONDENCE OF HON. D. D. BARNARD.

Mr. FISH. I submitted on the day before yesterday a resolution asking for certain correspondence, to the consideration of which at that time the Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] objected. I believe now there is no objection to its adoption. I ask the Senate, therefore, to take up the resolution now and adopt it.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence of Mr. Barnard, late Minister of the United States in Prussia, with the United States consul at Bremen, and of that consul with the Government of Bremen, relative to the case of Mr. Conrad Schmidt, a naturalized citizen of the United States, arrested at Bremen, and detained there upon a requisition from the Government of Hanover, claiming Schmidt as a subject of that kingdom.

Also, a copy of a letter addressed by Mr. Barnard, while Minister of the United States at Berlin, to his Majesty the King of Prussia, in October, 1852, on the subject of religious toleration, and of a dispatch addressed by Mr. Barnard to the Department of State in reference thereto.

Also, copies of the correspondence of the Legation of the United States at Berlin, with the Minister of the Grand Duke of Baden, at Berlin, in regard to the arrest and maltreatment of E. T. Dana, W. B. Dwight, and Dr. Ramsey, citizens of the United States, at Heidelberg, in the Grand Duchy of Baden.

LAND SYSTEM IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of organizing a separate surveying district, embracing the Territory of Washington.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I present a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, upon the subject of that resolution, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. RUSK, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the transportation of the mails of the United States on railroads; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN McAVOY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John McAvoy, have directed me to report a bill for his relief and to ask the Senate to consider it and put it upon its passage now. There can be no objection to it when it is understood.

The bill was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct that twenty dollars be paid to John McAvoy, late a private in company H, eighth regiment, United States infantry, which sum was paid by him for transportation from Brazos Santiago to New Orleans, while he was in the service of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The petitioner merely claims the sum of twenty dollars for an expense which he incurred on his own account, which should have been paid by the Government. He was a soldier under General Worth in Mexico; and became sick, and was placed upon the sick furlough. He was provided with an order from General Worth on the Quartermaster General for his transportation to New Orleans. He went as far as Brazos Santiago, from which point, owing to the employment of the Government vessels, he was obliged to defray the expense of his own transportation to New Orleans. The amount thus paid by him, the committee think, should be refunded.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent in the consideration thereof, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 12, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. I assure the House, Mr. Speaker, that it is with pain I again take the floor. The bill proposing to graduate and reduce the price of the public land came up yesterday in its order. At the solicitation of many persons who desired the postponement of the consideration of that measure again, in order that others which they deemed of pressing importance might be considered and acted on, I agreed that it should be postponed. I am extreme in the disposition to oblige every gentleman of this House, when I can do so. I am now going to ask the unanimous consent of the House to postpone the further consideration of the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public land for two weeks from to-morrow. Then, I trust, that all members will be prepared to act on the measure.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object to making the bill a special order.

Mr. COBB. It is a special order now, and I only desire that its further consideration shall be postponed. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HAMILTON. I cannot do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion can only be made by unanimous consent; and the gentleman from Maryland objects.

DELEGATE FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. The Delegate elect from the Territory of Washington is present, and I move, Mr. Speaker, that he be sworn in.

Mr. COLUMBIA LANCASTER, the Delegate from Washington Territory, was then conducted to the Speaker's chair, and took the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

MAILS TO CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bill to empower the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco according to time.

On motion by Mr. MURRAY, the Committee on Printing was discharged from the further consideration of the following memorial and resolutions; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Resolution to print ten thousand extra copies of the majority report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the bill making grants of land to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons;

Resolution to print ten thousand extra copies of the minority report of same committee on same bill; and

Resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of printing extra copies of so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and tables as relates to the revision of the present tariff.

Memorial of Joseph G. C. Kennedy, relating to the statistics of manufacturers.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That there be printed by the printer of the House ten thousand copies of Captain R. B. Marcy's survey and exploration of the Red river and its sources, together with the accompanying maps and plates, for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to request the House to receive a report, in order that the bill that accompanies it may take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. EDGERTON. I object.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

MAILS TO THE PACIFIC.

The SPEAKER. The question is on referring the following bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union: "A bill to empower the Postmaster General to contract for the transportation of the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco according to time."

Mr. PHELPS. That is a bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to say something in reference to it.

Mr. HAMILTON. I believe I am entitled to the floor upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman is mistaken. I obtained the floor yesterday, but yielded it for a motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That is the fact of the case.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have a word or two to say in reference to this bill.

Mr. CHURCHWELL, (interposing.) Is the question before the House on committing the bill, or on postponing it for three weeks?

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Is there not a motion pending to postpone the bill for three weeks?

The SPEAKER. That motion was made, but withdrawn, the Clerk informs the Chair.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Well, then, I move to postpone the consideration of the bill for three weeks.

Mr. HAMILTON. Oh, no; I cannot yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I thought the motion was pending.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to have the facts of this case understood. When this question was last before the House I was upon the floor; but a gentleman from Ohio arrested me by calling the attention of the House to the fact that the morning hour had expired.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, the Chair will state that this measure came up yesterday morning. The gentleman from Virginia was not in his seat; or, if he was, did not claim his right, and the gentleman from Maryland acquired a right to the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have but a few words to say in reference to this subject. This important bill has been introduced into the House with a considerable flourish of trumpets. The gentlemen who have spoken in its favor have urged the necessity and convenience of having speedy transportation between the Atlantic and the Pacific coast. From the arguments adduced by gentlemen in favor of the proposition, I would gather that it is to reduce the cost of transportation, to add to the revenues of the Post Office Department, and to be a great advantage to the country in every particular. Sir, the speeches of these gentlemen, and the bill and substitute upon the table, and as printed, do not agree.

The bill that lies upon your table proposes to establish a mail from New Orleans to San Francisco, and to give compensation, in specific terms, for each trip; and the bill, as published in the papers, proposes to give a monthly compensation. The bill now pending, if passed, must necessarily become the law of the land without amendment; and whether the mail is to be monthly, by the trip, or annual, must depend upon its provisions. There runs through the whole bill a general indefiniteness and vagueness, that requires marked consideration and deliberation; and, therefore, I think that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

But there is something else in this bill to which I wish to direct your attention. You propose to allow $25,000 if the mail be transported in twenty-five days; and so you go on increasing the amount as you diminish the time, until you arrive at sixteen days, when you are to pay $850,000 for the transportation of the mail from New Orleans to San Francisco. The idea intended to be impressed upon this House was, that it involved provision for the transportation of the mail from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and that it cut down and changed the existing contracts. It is not so, but it is a bill establishing additional mail facilities from New Orleans to San Francisco, and that too by causing an enormous increase of expense to the Post Office Department of the country. The postal revenues are now far below the annual expenditures. This is not a bill to change existing contracts, but to extend additional mail facilities; and the question is whether, in view of the now inadequate receipts of the postal Department, and the proposed addition of such an enormous expense to this Department, this House is ready to pass this bill? Will they pass it, and thus add so greatly to the embarrassment of that Department?

Our mail expenses are already large enough; and our Atlantic and Pacific facilities of communication are sufficiently adequate to the wants of the country to justify deliberation upon a question of this importance. The questions involved in the bill eminently demand the deliberate consideration of this House; for the bill is to make void no contracts, but to establish additional contracts. Suppose you were, under this bill, to annul the old systems, do you think that this country would tolerate the idea that we were to have but one mail from New Orleans to San Francisco, and no other? Will the whole North and the middle States rely, for mail facilities, to and from the Pacific coast through New Orleans alone? If that is the design, the House of Representatives should never tolerate or give its sanction to a system of this kind. As the object of the bill is to establish additional mail facilities merely from New Orleans to San Francisco, I wish to know further in reference to the details of the plan.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me to ask him a question here?

Mr. HAMILTON. Certainly.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I merely desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland the simple question, whether he is not aware of the fact that there is already a daily mail from New Orleans to every part of the United States? Has he not heard of that being so?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have heard of that. It is immaterial. I want to know the facts in regard of the principles of this bill, as it now stands before this House: whether the design of the bill is to confine the Pacific mails to the port of New Orleans. That is the important question. If the whole transportation of the mails is to be confined to that locality, I want to know the fact, and the House and country to know it. But, Mr. Speaker, the bill is one to provide additional mail facilities. That is the object of the bill. It is to impose the additional expense of a million of dollars on the Post Office Department, which is now weighed down and overburdened with its expenditure, to the utter ruin of the post offices and mail facilities in the interior. Such is the bill before the House. The gentleman from Tennessee may talk about his sliding scale. I am in favor of increasing the facilities for mail transportation as much as that honorable gentleman, or the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.] I, too, am opposed to monopoly. I do not say that this bill promotes a monopoly, except it be a monopoly of the route. It may be a monopoly of the Tehuantepec route, or of the Vera Cruz and Acapulco route, or it may be a monopoly of route by some other way. I am not aware that it does create a monopoly. I know not anything about the Sloo or the Gary grants. I am aware of the facilities for the quicker transportation of the mails from New Orleans to Vera Cruz, and thence to Acapulco. I know that some two thousand miles of sea transportation are saved by adopting the route from New Orleans to San Francisco, by way of Tehuantepec. But if this line is opened, the postal Department can take advantage of its facilities as well as any others. That route of travel may be fully completed in the course of three years; and, if you pass this bill you will saddle on the Post Office Department, for seven years after, an annual expenditure for this service of $1,200,000—at all events, not less than $1,000,000. It is all nonsense, Mr. Speaker, to talk about transporting the mail from New Orleans to San Francisco for $25,000.

I do not desire to trespass on the time of the House, but I want to notice one or two arguments of my honorable friend from Tennessee. So far as the arguments for this system of mail transportation are concerned, some of them demand the reprobation of gentlemen here who believe as I do, in their impropriety. He, a Democrat from Tennessee, and I, a Democrat from Maryland, differ widely in our notions of what the Post Office Department ought to do.

Mr. CHURCHWELL, (in a low tone of voice.) And in a great many other things, too.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is true. We differ in a great many other things. One of that gentleman's main arguments was, that the object of this bill was to afford facilities for the transportation of the gold from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast. What has the Post Office Department to do with the transportation of gold more than with the carriage of oil, from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic? If they can send their gold here by Adams & Co.'s Express, or in vessels round the Pacific coast, or in any other way, so be it.

Gold is no more an article of commodity, and no less an article of commodity, than the oil of the Pacific; and this Government has no more right to afford means of transportation for gold than it has for oil, or whatever other commodities that may be produced on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Speaker, I would be rejoiced to lend my vote and voice to any proper system for affording additional mail facilities between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; but I have heard quite enough of this proposed cheap system.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. HAMILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH. I have always heard the increased efficiency of our Post Office Department advocated on the ground of its great value to the country, but not on account of economy in the transportation of the mails. The increased efficiency of the mail system, some years ago, before the introduction of expresses, was vindicated on that ground. The transportation of the mails by railroad was vindicated on that ground; and, if we can now still further increase the facilities of transportation of the mail, we do so upon the same ground; and it is evident, according to the statements made here, that we can do so.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has misunderstood me entirely. I have not at all spoken against the great public convenience and profit arising from a speedy transmission of the mails. I was speaking about the right of the Government of the United States to transport the gold, or the produce, or the merchandise of any man. Let them avail themselves of the advantages of the various express lines which are in operation between the Atlantic and Pacific shores, and which are established between every portion of our country. Let them also avail themselves of the postal arrangements which the Government has already established for the purpose of securing the cheapest and speediest transmission of the mails. It is the duty of the Government to attend to this latter branch of transportation, and it is the duty of individuals to avail themselves of whatever advantages may be thus furnished.

The remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has nothing to do with this question. As an argument, I object to it. As an argument against or in favor of this bill, it has nothing to do. Look at it for one moment: Capital will find out its own reward, its own modes of employment, and its own channels of operation, independent of the Government, and indeed in spite of the Government. This has already been proved, and is obvious to every one; and anything which we can do, as a Government, will be more likely to retard than to advance the interest of private enterprise. Let us attend to our legitimate business. I am not here to decide upon what private individuals shall or shall not do. Not at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown what is the character of this bill, without noticing some of the other arguments which have been advanced in its support. Reference has been made to the great subject of cheap postage. We heard something of that two years ago; and in carrying out those ideas of cheap postage, a system was adopted which has been pursued until the whole internal postal arrangements of the country have become disordered and oppressed, and until the large cities of the country have monopolized all the advantages and privileges of that system, to the detriment of the smaller and rural post offices of the country. You have mails for the large cities daily and hourly, and we of the interior are called upon to give the hard-earned fruits of our industry for part payment of the transportation, and to pay for their privileges and conveniences, which they are enjoying. We have as much right to pay the expenses of the transportation of the merchandise of John Jacob Astor, as for the transportation of his letters. You call upon the people of the country, whose correspondence is comparatively limited and small, to pay their money to sustain a system for the benefit of those who do write; to pay an undue share to support a system monopolized by those who are realizing large fortunes from their investments, while we, of the interior of the country, who are taxed to support that system, are obliged to be satisfied with a limited return upon the products of our common industry.

We have heard enough of this matter of cheap postage. Public meetings were held in every city, and agents were swarming around the Halls of Congress, keeping up the cry of cheap postage. What was the consequence of their action, and of the action of Congress? The mails were overburdened, and overloaded with useless matter, until the cost of transportation of the same has become so great that the Department, because of this and other means, is $2,000,000 behind the receipts, and the whole system is broken down. Far sooner would the people of my section of the country pay, and pay honestly, for their mails, rather than have a system so disorganized as is the present one. I am in favor of a reasonable and moderate rate of postage, and of affording mail facilities to all parts of the country. But the idea of paying $1,000,000 a year under this bill; $850,000 to the Collins' line, and large sums to other companies, until the whole postal revenue, and more than the whole, is absorbed, and the postal facilities of the interior of the country injured and burdened, is an idea fraught with ruin to the interests of our country.

I am opposed to such a course, and the bill now under consideration is one of the bills which are designed, or which tend to carry that system of things into operation.

I know my friend from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] is sincere in his support of this bill—I have the highest respect for him, and I would not oppose it, did I not feel called upon to do so from a sense of duty to my constituents, and to the best interests of the country.

It is a favorite project of his, and the honorable gentleman announced it here to be his bantling. A high sense of public duty impels me to regard this House of Representatives not as a nursery for bantlings. We have higher and greater public duties to perform than that. Sir, practical questions should come before us for our consideration. We should deliberate upon such subjects as regard the public interest, and the public good, in our action upon them.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the consideration of this question will not be postponed. I do not like postponements. We are postponing everything of importance which comes before us; and if we go on in this way, before the present session shall be brought to a close, the business of the House will have been brought into such a condition that it will be almost impossible for us to accomplish anything. It was for that reason that I objected to the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union being postponed. As these questions come up, let us settle them, and settle them finally, for we shall have important business in the future, which will demand our consideration and action. I repeat, sir, that I am hostile to this postponement. Let us settle this question now; or if the House require further time for its consideration, let us refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where we may reflect upon it, and in which we may perfect the bill in all its details.

Mr. McMULLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS also, at the same time, addressed the Speaker.

Mr. McMULLIN. I shall detain the House but a very few minutes. The remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, who has just taken his seat, have superseded the necessity of my addressing the House to that extent which I had before intended. I first desire to notice a remark made by the gentleman from California [Mr. LATHAM] the other day, when this subject was under consideration.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I rise to a question of order. If my recollection serves me right, the honorable gentleman from Virginia has made one speech against this bill, and therefore is not now entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. If that question of order prevails, I shall claim the floor.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I shall be very glad to hear the gentleman from Missouri. I did not intend to address the House myself at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia having addressed the House once upon this question, cannot retain the floor if any other gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have only to say that this very neighborly, kind courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee merits my most cordial thanks. [Laughter.]

Mr. PHELPS. I am very sorry to deprive my friend from Virginia of the floor; but as the gentleman from Tennessee made the question of order, I thought it was for the purpose of claiming it for himself; and I therefore gave notice that I should contest his right to it. I do not, however, desire to occupy the hour to which I am entitled, and I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia before I shall conclude.

Mr. Speaker, the bill introduced by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, is wrongly entitled. It should be entitled "A bill to increase the deficit in the revenues of the Post Office Department from a million and a quarter to a million and a half;" for before I close my remarks in relation to this bill, I will demonstrate to the House that this must be the inevitable result of its passage.

The other day I made a motion to lay this bill upon the table. There was then a motion pending to postpone which precluded all debate, and therefore I made the motion. But inasmuch as I did make a motion, which, if it had been successful, would have defeated the bill, I feel it to be my duty to give the reasons why I am opposed to this measure. I have no disposition to deprive the people of California, or the people upon the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, of rapid communications by mail. On the contrary, I desire to see rapid mail facilities established in every portion of the country. But when you proceed to expedite the transmission of the mail by providing for its transportation by a different route from that in which it is now carried, I like to see measures of retrenchment and economy going side by side.

It is true that the line of steamers which this bill proposes to establish will carry the mail more expeditiously than those now employed. I have no doubt such will be the result; and if the time should be shortened as much as is anticipated, the proposed line will entirely engross the transportation of the letter and newspaper mail, and leave the other "mailable matter" to be carried by the existing line. Why should you, while you have one mail line from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, by the way of Chagres, which now costs the Government of the United States $700,000—more than $700,000 the last fiscal year—establish another route which will entirely supersede the existing one, and increase the deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department from $1,250,000 to $1,500,000. The gentleman from Tennessee does not propose to abrogate existing mail contracts.

He does not propose by his bill any method, by which we shall relieve the Government of the United States from the payment to Law and Aspinwall the amounts they now receive under the contracts made with them several years ago. No, these are to be kept in force.

Then you are to establish a mail route different from that now traversed by your steamers, or by travel. The gentleman from Tennessee does not believe that you can expedite the transmission of mail matter if you adopt the Nicaragua route. Then there are two other routes: the Tehuantepec, and the one by Vera Cruz and Acapulco, the latter known as the Ramsay and Cormack route. In relation to those routes, it must be recollected by the members of the House that there are gentlemen who claim they have grants from the Government of Mexico of the exclusive transportation over them. I am aware that there is a contest between those who claim under the Garay and the Sloo grants on the Tehuantepec route; but, as far as the other route is concerned, I presume there is no controversy; for, during the late Administration, when the Post Office was under the control of Mr. Hubbard, a conditional contract was entered into for the transportation of the mail by the way of Vera Cruz and Acapulco, which the present Postmaster General, on his induction into office, refused to ratify.

The gentleman proposes, in his extreme liberality, that the contract shall exist for ten years. He also proposes that if any cheaper, any nearer, and better route can be obtained, this contract shall be annulled. Now, if the right of transit by the two routes which have been indicated, and over which no travel is now passing, be vested exclusively in any individual or individuals, by virtue of the grant from the Mexican Government, how does he expect any nearer and more expeditious route can be procured than those?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the object is to supersede the contract that may be made if any other person can carry the mail quicker; not if any other can do it on a better route.

Mr. PHELPS. I have listened to the explanation of my friend from Virginia. I am glad that he has made it. They have taken the wrong course. They have not taken the proper method to accomplish what is intended. Is there any provision in the bill that the existing contracts shall be annulled? Is there any provision authorizing any officer of the Government to endeavor to buy up the old contracts, or to extinguish them? None at all. When the measure was before Congress to reduce the postage, I myself advocated it; but I also desired to diminish the cost of the transportation of the mail within the United States. I sought to reduce the exorbitant amount which was then, and is now, claimed by various railroad companies in the United States for the transportation of the mail; and if the reforms which I advocated had been adopted, the Post Office Department would now have been a self-sustaining machine. Instead of that, large expenditures are still added, and continue to be added; and the cost of the transportation of the mail is increased. By transferring the service from steamboats, coaches, or horseback, to railroads, the cost is vastly increased, while the cost of transportation of passengers is generally greatly diminished.

Mr. LATHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not he has ever read the existing contract for carrying the mail by the Panama route?

Mr. PHELPS. Yes, sir; I examined it several years ago.

Mr. LATHAM. I presume it was about seven years ago.

Mr. PHELPS. I cannot say how that is. This subject has been under consideration during each Congress for the last six or seven years. Inquiries have been made; calls for information from the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Navy have been made in relation to every contract for the transportation of mails by ocean steamers, and those contracts have been published, and I have examined them at different times since those contracts were made. But I do not see the pertinency of the gentleman's question to the subject under consideration.

Sir, the friends of this bill are endeavoring to have it put upon its passage. A motion to commit is pending, to be followed up, as it was the other day, by a motion to postpone to a day certain, which precludes debate, thus indicating that it is the intention of the friends of the measure to carry it through the House without permitting full and free discussion of it. They resist the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where full and free discussion could take place.

The gentlemen from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] and California, [Mr. LATHAM,] and Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] have alluded to the time now consumed in the transportation of the mails from New York to San Francisco. The mail contract, as originally established, was for the transportation of the mail from New York, by the way of Havana, to Chagres, and from Panama, by the way of San Francisco, to Astoria. If, therefore, gentlemen propose to abrogate the existing mail contract for the transportation of the mail between New York and San Francisco, by the way of the Isthmus of Panama, they must make some provision for the transportation of the mails from San Francisco to Astoria, for that service is now embraced in the contract.

But, sir, I intend to demonstrate, that if the steamers which may be put upon this projected line between the cities of New Orleans and San Francisco, by the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, possess as good speed only as those now engaged in the transportation of the mails by the Isthmus of Panama, that transportation can be made in twelve or thirteen days. Now, according to the schedule of prices proposed in this bill, if the mail is transported in thirteen days, the Post Office Department is saddled with an expenditure of $1,300,000 per annum; if in twelve days, with $1,400,000; and if in eleven days, with $1,500,000 per annum. The distance by the route now traversed by the steamers leaving New York city, by way of Havana to Aspinwall, and thence by the Isthmus of Panama to San Francisco, is five thousand eight hundred and fifty miles. The distance, however, from New Orleans to San Francisco, by the way of Chagres, is only four thousand nine hundred and sixty miles. The distance from New Orleans to San Francisco, by the way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, is only three thousand three hundred and sixty miles; one hundred and thirty miles of which is the Isthmus transit, and only about forty miles of that is by land transportation, for the river Coalzacoalcos is navigable for ninety miles.

Now, if the steamers that may be put upon the projected route between New Orleans and San Francisco, by the way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, will only make the same speed made by the two steamers which recently brought the mails from San Francisco, via Panama, to New Orleans—I refer to the Golden Gate and the El Dorado—the ocean service can be performed in eleven days, seven days between San Francisco and the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and four days across the Gulf of Mexico—making eleven days of water transportation—leaving one hundred and thirty miles of Isthmus transportation by river and land. What say those interested in this Tehuantepec route?—for under the law of the last session of Congress proposals were invited by the Postmaster General for the transportation of the mail upon the various ocean routes of the United States. The object was to learn whether exorbitant prices were not now paid to the companies that had made these contracts in proportion to the service to be performed. I have here a letter written by two gentlemen, A. G. Sloo and Arnold G. Harris, who claim they have the exclusive right to the transportation of the mail across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] himself has proposed such a large compensation in his bill, I have no doubt that he looks to the transportation of the mail under and by virtue of the provisions of this bill by the Ramsay and Cormack route—the route via Vera Cruz and Acapulco. Messrs. Sloo and Harris make proposals for semi-monthly service, but they do not indicate the length of time in which they obligate themselves to perform this service. In a letter of the same date with their proposals, they use the following language:

"NEW ORLEANS, October 20, 1853.

"SIR: We have the honor to inclose herewith a proposition for the transportation of the United States mail between New Orleans and San Francisco, and beg leave to say a few words in explanation.

"By a contract already closed with responsible parties, a plank road from Luchil, the head of steamboat navigation on the Coalzacoalcos river, to the Pacific ocean, is to be completed by the 1st of January, 1855, when we will be able to make connection between New Orleans and the Pacific ocean easily in less than five days. From that point eight days to San Francisco is a large allowance of time—we think it will often be done in seven; and between New Orleans and the Pacific in nearer four than five days; so that, between the two points, the time will average under twelve days."

Gentlemen who are interested in that line of roads say that after the first day of January next they will be able to make a communication between New Orleans and the Pacific ocean, by the Tehuantepec route, in less than five days. From that point to San Francisco eight days is a large allowance of time. Taking the lowest time specified in the schedule, the compensation for eleven days would be $1,500,000 dollars. But these gentlemen say that they will perform this service for $750,000. But I have here their proposals, which I will read:

"NEW ORLEANS, October 20, 1853.

"We, the undersigned, propose to transport the United States mail from New Orleans to San Francisco and back, via the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, semi-monthly, for the sum of $750,000 per annum. They also propose to perform any increased service, due notice being given, for the additional compensation of seventy-five per cent. on the first contract, for a period of ten years. The service to commence on the 1st day of January, 1855, provided the contract is made before the 1st of March next; if made subsequent to that time, a corresponding allowance of time, if required, to be given us in commencing the service; or, if the contract be made immediately, we will commence on the 1st of October next.

A. G. SLOO,

ARNOLD HARRIS.

"HON. JAMES CAMPBELL, Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker, instead of introducing a system of economy, as contended for by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] you increase the amount of compensation to be given for this mail service over that proposed by good and responsible men. Why do we double the sum? Why do we propose to pay from $1,300,000 to $1,500,000 for this service, when we have gentlemen who represent that they are ready to transport the mail between New Orleans and San Francisco in from eleven to thirteen days; and that, too, at only $750,000 per annum?

Mr. Speaker, that is my sentiment in regard to this matter. I do not propose to discuss this question further. Since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, I have opposed the system of ocean steam mail contracts. Already all your ocean mail contracts that are now in existence, with the exception of one or two, have been made by special legislation of Congress; and by directing the Secretary of the Navy, or the Postmaster General himself to contract with persons named in the law thus authorizing it, at a sum stipulated in the law, and not having the matter open to public competition, you have had these contractors, or some of them, afterwards coming here, and saying that the remuneration provided for in the contracts was inadequate and insufficient, and asking for additional compensation; and we found Congress ready to vote that additional compensation. This principle of giving additional compensation I have opposed; and I have opposed the forming of these contracts. That has been the course of policy which I have pursued, and which I am pursuing at the present time. For, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if this system is persisted in, it will destroy the Post Office Department. If this bill now before the House is enacted, it will draw from the revenue of that Department $1,500,000; and this, too, from a Department where there is already a deficit of $2,000,000 a year; which would make the deficit then $3,500,000 a year.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly.

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not now take exception to the point of order made upon me by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] I think, however, he might have saved himself that trouble—

Mr. CHURCHWELL, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to explain?

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] has the floor; if he consents to yield I have no objection.

Mr. PHELPS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for an explanation.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. What I desire to say is, that I had no disposition to cut off the speech of the gentleman from Virginia; for I have always heard his speeches with great pleasure. But I thought the gentleman was out of order, and the Chair decided that I was right in my opinion.

Mr. McMULLIN. I accept with pleasure the explanation of the gentleman from Tennessee. But I think, with all due deference to the Chair and to that gentleman, that if I understand the facts of the case, I was not out of order. I rose the other day to submit a motion to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I did not then discuss the merits of the bill, but declined to do so.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia afford me another opportunity to explain?

Mr. McMULLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. My understanding was, Mr. Speaker, when this debate was closed last week, that the gentleman from California [Mr. LATHAM] yielded the floor to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] on the condition that he would renew the motion which had been made for postponing the consideration of this bill for three weeks. (To Mr. LATHAM.) Am I right?

Mr. LATHAM. I understand it so.

Mr. McMULLIN. If the gentleman from Tennessee had but waited to hear me, he would have come at the facts of the case.

The SPEAKER. The papers, the record of the Journal, and the recollection of the Clerk and Speaker all go to show that on this bill there is but one proposition pending, which is to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LATHAM. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] yield me the floor for a word of explanation?

Mr. PHELPS. Yes; I will yield it for that purpose.

Mr. LATHAM. The proceedings, as I recollect them, are reported correctly in the Globe of Friday last. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] made a motion to postpone the consideration of this bill for three weeks. He gave way to me on the express condition that I should renew that motion. After I closed my remarks, I accordingly renewed the motion, and then gave way for the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] with the express condition that he would renew it—

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) And the gentleman from Virginia failed to do so. That is the history of the affair.

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman from California has stated the facts as I was proceeding to state them myself when I was interrupted. I was not in the House when the bill came up yesterday, or I would then have, in good faith, renewed the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] to postpone for three weeks. The floor was taken from me by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] the other day when I was about to renew the motion; and hence, sir, I thought the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] was not acting towards me in that extraordinary friendly character which he professed the other day when he was speaking upon this subject.

My purpose now is, more particularly, to notice the remarks of the gentleman from California, [Mr. LATHAM,] and to call the attention of the House to the fact which he stated the other day, that about one third of the whole revenue of the Post Office Department was paid for the transportation of letters by the express lines. Now I beg the House to remember this important fact, that upon all the mail lines established by law, those express companies have no right to transmit letters, and it is the duty of the Post Office Department to enforce the law upon that subject. The argument of the gentleman from California, therefore, ought not to have any influence with the House, because of the fact that if you enforce the law you will break up this system of carrying letters by these express lines. I understand that the mails to and from California are of immense size, amounting sometimes to twelve tons of matter.

I am perfectly willing to afford all the mail facilities which are necessary, but I ask the House if they are prepared to vote for these additional mail facilities between New Orleans and San Francisco; if they are willing to offer a direct premium to those gentlemen who are contemplated as the contractors within the provisions of this bill? I ask why does not your Postmaster General let this contract, as he does all other mail contracts, to the lowest bidder? Why provide in this bill for a monopoly?

Sir, I did not intend to say one word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, as the gentlemen from Maryland and Missouri have so fully discussed the nature of this measure; and I shall content myself by voting, either to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; or, if the friends of this bill prefer to recommit it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I will vote for that reference. But I will not consent that the vote shall be taken now, unless those who agree with me that the bill is objectionable, think best that it should be taken now, and in that case I will consent to it.

Mr. PHELPS. I have not understood that this bill contemplated disturbing the existing mail contracts now existing for the transportation of the mails from New York to San Francisco, but that it contemplates the establishment of an additional line. By the provisions of this bill, as I understand it, the Postmaster General is required to accept a contract, and enter into an agreement, for the transportation of the letter and paper mail only. Now it is true, perhaps, that in ordinary, common parlance the paper and letter mail would embrace all the mailable matter, but in the legal acceptance of those words it would not embrace all mailable matter besides letters and newspapers. This shows that it was the intention of the mover of the bill to establish this line as an additional line to California.

Mr. CHURCHWELL here obtained the floor. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield the floor for a moment?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Does the gentleman rise to a question of order?

Mr. WASHBURNE. I do.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Then I yield, of course.

Mr. WASHBURNE. What I desired to know was, whether the gentleman has not occupied the floor once upon this matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has had the floor once.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Does the gentleman desire to speak upon the bill?

Mr. WASHBURNE. No, sir, I do not. If the gentleman has occupied the floor once, my purpose was to move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I have not occupied the floor upon the pending question.

The SPEAKER. If that is the case, the gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am well satisfied from the course of things here this morning, that the bill has more merit in it than was at first supposed. It has attracted the attention of the able member from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] who has discussed and dissected its details, this morning, and still there is life left in it—the main principle.

Sir, neither the honorable gentleman from Maryland nor the honorable gentleman from Missouri have touched the principle of this bill. Not at all. They have dwelt, from the beginning to the end, upon questions concerning its details. They have talked about the compensation which is offered. They have spoken of the different routes between the two proposed starting points, but they have not touched the great principles of the bill itself, not one of them. They have not told the House the principle was wrong; they need not, for time is money.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland tells the House that he differs from me in reference to this question. That is true, and I differ upon many other questions besides this. I take it the honorable gentleman belongs to the class of which there are several in this House, who are opposed to all changes, whether for good or evil, who would not spend one dollar to save ten, but who are willing to pay out a dollar at a time all day, as long as they can get eighty-seven and a half cents to one dollar back. I will not say such is the character of all who oppose this bill. They are the men who belong—if it would not be indelicate to use the expression—to the Old Foggy party. For myself, I belong to the Young American party; to the progressive party; to that party which is imbued with a spirit of goaheaditiveness, who, when they see one branch of the Government withering, shrinking, becoming a mere incumbrance upon the people's treasury, are ready to bring forward and support a measure which will have the effect to give that department new life, and place it in a healthy condition, so that it will accommodate the wants of the public, and thereby yield revenue sufficient for the purpose of carrying it on. No business will succeed, sir, unless conducted in a manner to command the patronage of the business public. Let me ask if this is the case with the Post Office Department? No, sir, the expresses carry the mail, and the Department pay hundreds of thousands of dollars to companies for running their steamers under the pretense of carrying the Government mail. Is this not so? Were not the facts this way before express lines were established? Then it had no competition, and the rural districts were better served with mail facilities than now.

Sir, what was the condition of this Department of the Government before these expresses were established for carrying the mail? We had revenue enough to afford proper mail facilities. But gentlemen now say the effect of this bill will be to increase the deficit of this Department; and the honorable gentleman from Missouri, with pleasing manner, says the title of the bill should be changed, and that it should be a bill to increase the deficit in the revenues of the Department. And why? Because it proposes to increase the sums now paid for carrying the mail. It does no such thing. It proposes entirely a different thing. He thinks that time is of but little consequence. To this argument I have no reply. All know the importance of time.

Now I wish this House distinctly to understand that in making out this schedule, I have no choice as to the particular amount of compensation. The object I had in view was only to present a sufficient sum to induce competition in carrying out the principle, which, like every new principle, must have a test before it is permanently established. You may, if you choose, strike out the compensation altogether, and if you can get any one of sufficient patriotism and enterprise to undertake to carry it for nothing, no one will be more gratified than I shall.

But gentlemen say, Why take it away from the Postmaster General? Sir, it proposes that he shall accept the contract, if in accordance with the law, as he accepts all contracts. Why propose a monopoly? The bill proposes no monopoly. One great feature of it is to destroy monopoly, which its establishment will do effectually. It leaves the matter open to competition. It invites the attention of the commercial world to contend for speed. It proposes that, after a contract shall have been made, if an individual or a company prove sufficiently and satisfactorily before the Postmaster General, that they can carry the mail three consecutive months in less time than those having the contract do, they shall be entitled to the contract. Does the bill propose that the Government shall advance anything for the purpose of carrying out the project, as has been the case on former occasions? No, sir; the contract is to be carried out by individuals, at their own expense, and not at the expense of the Government.

Does it propose to take vessels off the hands of contractors whenever there shall be a disposition to change the contract, as is the case with the Panama and other contracts? Not at all. Sir, the bill contains a new and important principle, which if tested, will be adopted and established. The Government is amply guarded in that respect, indeed in every respect. If it is successful the Government will receive much advantage from it; if it fails, the Government loses nothing. It is at least safe. But the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] tells the House that every time the mails are changed there is an increase of expenditure. Against that I desire to guard. It is expressly provided in the last section of the bill that a change shall cause no expenditure to the Government. I request gentlemen to read that section, and they will satisfy themselves of the correctness of my position.

We are told time is of no consequence. What are the facts? With regard to the southern mail, by way of the South Carolina railroad to New Orleans, for speed you now pay over three hundred dollars per mile. Time is money—speed saves time; time saved is money made. Yet gentlemen say that time is of little importance; that the revenue of the Department cannot be increased by the saving of time. I ask, in reply, if it could perform for the business public their mail service in as good time as the individual express lines now do, if it would not receive additional mail business—and consequently increased revenue, far exceeding the outlay, to bring about the result?

The honorable member from Maryland leads me to believe, from his remarks, that he desires, if I may be allowed the illustration, to place the Government in the predicament of a landlord owning an indifferent hotel, badly kept, alongside of one well conditioned and satisfactorily kept. What is the consequence? Is it not an inevitable result that one will force the other landlord to put his house in a condition to compete with its rival, or to suffer ruin, or to abandon it; for the house well kept will get all the patronage, while the other sinks and ruins the landlord? Is this not precisely the case with the Government and Post Office Department? Is it not, in a measure, superseded by expresses? Is not this decrease of business the cause of the heavy deficit in the revenue of that Department? Must not that branch of the Government be in a condition to afford ample facilities and offer equal inducements to the business public before they can hope to secure its patronage? Is it now in that condition? Are the wants of the public satisfied by the Post Office Department? If that be so, there is no necessity for the passage of the bill. But what are the facts? Here is the letter of the Postmaster General, in which he recommends additional service for California, to the extent of $600,000; and yet he objects to the bill. If I may be allowed to judge, and I hope I do not judge harshly, it seems to me that his main objection is because the bill appears to take from him patronage, while it increases the revenue of the Department. The adoption of the main principle of the bill, sir, is all I care particularly about; as to its details, arrange them as you please. I do not desire to have anything embraced in the bill which is objectionable to the House. The principle of the bill, I repeat, is what I wish to see established. I desire that the mails shall be carried according to time; not that they shall be placed in steamers, and these steamers allowed to make their trips just as they think proper; to load and to unload freight on the way, and detain and delay Government business. I desire that whenever the Government mail is put aboard that they will speed quickly to the destined port. That is the object of the bill.

As I have already said, however, I do not wish to embrace anything in it which is objectionable to the House. The gentleman from Missouri says that the time is too long. It is ten years; and he talks about the Garay, and the Sloo, and the Ramsay, and the Cormack, and I do not know how many other routes. The bill proposes the quickest route. Nicaragua is now said to be the quickest. If so, let them have it; but if anybody can beat them on the same or any other route, the parties making quicker time should be entitled to the contract. In other words, the United States mail, the people's mail, should move along and up with all the developments of the times.

Ought not Government reap the advantage of such improvements and developments alike with express lines. For myself, I have no choice of routes, and certainly no concern about pay. If you will establish the principle of my bill, and any man has patriotism enough to take the contract without compensation, strike out the schedule. If ten years is too long for the contract, bring it down to five years. If that is too long, bring it down to one year. All I ask of you is to establish the principle, nothing more and nothing less. Once properly understood by the country, it will be demanded at your hands.

I hope the House will give that consideration to the bill that its merits demand, and I have every reason to believe that they will do so. The motion that was made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] a few days ago, to postpone the consideration of the bill for three weeks, has been lost, I may say by accident, as it was distinctly understood that it was to be renewed. I hope the House will, therefore, vote down the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and let it be postponed for three weeks, that members may have an opportunity to investigate it as they desire.

Mr. LETCHER. As my progressive friend has reached a water station, [laughter,] I would inquire why he does not propose to apply this principle to all the inland mails, as well as to the ocean mails?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. If the gentleman had examined the bill; if he had paid attention to the remarks which I submitted to the House the other day, he would have seen that the object is to establish the principle that hereafter, when contracts are let, the Postmaster General shall propose to receive bids for carrying the mails from point to point—say from some point in Virginia to the gentleman's "water station," if you please—[laughter] at so much as per schedule attached, according to time, and the Postmaster General will then have the privilege of selecting the lowest bids according to time, by which means he will be able to give greater mail facilities to the rural districts.

It has been argued that the districts in the interior will not be served by the adoption of this measure; and I was astonished to hear the gentleman from Maryland advance the idea, in his remarks to-day, that the interests of the large cities will be advanced by it. Sir, that is the cry continually, not only here, but elsewhere; and upon that point let me ask this simple question: Who is it that pays the largest amount of revenue into the Treasury? Does not your revenue come from the mercantile community as well as from the agricultural community? And can you advance the interests of the one without advancing the interests of the other? Do gentlemen here desire to draw a distinction between the agricultural and the commercial communities? And if so, what is the character of that distinction? Can the one exist without the other? Their interests are inseparable. Where is the basis of the one without the other? I propose to advance the interests of both. I propose to give strength to that arm of the Government which is now palsied.

We have here the report of the honorable gentleman at the head of that Department, telling us that the deficit is so great that he is unable to give proper facilities for the transportation of mails in the inland and rural districts. I propose to remedy this difficulty by establishing the principle of the bill, in order that our coaches may be replaced on our inland and rural routes; that our facilities may be increased. What is the fact? You may go to the Post Office Department to-day, and ask the Postmaster General to give you better mail facilities, or as good as you have had heretofore in years gone by in your inland country, and what does he tell you? He will tell you that he would do it with great pleasure, but that there is a large deficit in the revenues of the Department, and that he cannot go to any further expense.

I propose to remove this difficulty, to offer the public inducements to patronize his Department, and thereby increase its revenue and cut down the deficiency.

I trust the House will consent to postpone the consideration of this bill for three weeks, and that it may be printed, so that members may examine its details, and discuss its merits. If members will take time to examine its provisions, to consider the main principle involved, I have no fears of the result. Whatever may be the fate of the bill to-day, I am well satisfied that it will be adopted at some future day. If it is not, that withered arm of the Government will have to be severed from the body to preserve it, or it will eat out its vitals and absorb its blood. I care not for the schedule; it is the principle of the bill that I wish to see adopted. I desire to hold out such inducements to the business men of the community as will secure the safe and rapid transmission of the mails between the important points named in the bill, as will confer great and lasting benefit upon all the interests of the country.

Mr. Speaker, no new principle of permanent public utility was ever established without first having to wade through bitter opposition.

This bill contains a great principle. I did not expect it would pass without opposition. It would have been unreasonable to have supposed that it would. While I was prepared for this, sir, I did not think that the details would overshadow the principle of the bill in the mind of honorable gentlemen who have spoken against it.

Had the principle been made the object of attack, honorable gentlemen would perhaps have felt the necessity for a closer examination of the bill than their remarks indicate; but should the bill be lost, will the country excuse them for sacrificing an important measure because they would not tax their leisure to study the great principle proposed to be established? Gentlemen have attacked the details—the figures—and these are nothing. It is the principle I advocate. It is the principle I defend. I would see it firmly fixed in the administrative policy of the Government. Do this, and it is all I ask.

Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. OLDS. Let us have a vote some way upon this matter.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I do not desire to intrude further upon the patience of the House, although my bantling has been so fiercely attacked this morning. I will ask the House that the further consideration of the bill be postponed for three weeks, and that it be printed; and upon this motion I call the previous question.

Mr. KERR. Will it be in order to move to postpone the bill indefinitely?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion will not be in order until the motion to postpone to a day certain, and the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union are first disposed of.

Mr. KERR. I then move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. BISSELL. I believe the morning hour has expired, and I hope that the House will be inclined to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, as there are a few bills lying there.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] moves to postpone its further consideration to this day three weeks, which motion would take precedence of the motion to commit and print. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] moves to lay the bill upon the table, which will take precedence of either or both of the other motions. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The question was then taken on Mr. BISSELL's motion; and the House refused to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. But the gentleman from North Carolina, at my request, withdrew it for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion to postpone to a day certain would not be debatable.

Mr. LETCHER. Will not the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his motion to postpone for a moment? I promise to renew it.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I cannot do so.

Mr. LETCHER. I then renew the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The roll having been called, there were—yeas 89, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Ball, Belcher, Bennett, Boyce, Bridges, Campbell, Caruthers, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Craigie, Crocker, Culhoun, Dawson, Dean, Drum, Eastman, Eddy, Edmonds, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Ewing, Fuller, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Henn, Hubbard, Huester, Howe, Hunt, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, J. Clancy Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, Lindley, Lyon, McMullin, Macy, Maurice, Meacham, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Peckham, Phelps, Pratt, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Rogers, Ruffin, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Simmons, Singleton, Skelton, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Ellihu B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, Yates, and Zollcoffer—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Benson, Bissell, Carpenter, Chastain, Churchwell, Chingman, Colquitt, Cook, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dent, Disney, Dunbar, Dunham, Ederston, Ellison, Fenton, Florence, Goodrich, Greenwood, Grey, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hughes, Roland Jones, Latham, Lindsey, McDougall, Mace, Mayall, Smith Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Olds, Parker, John Perkins, Phillips, Riddle, Rowe, Shannon, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, Tweed, Upham, Vail, and Warren—59.

So the bill was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and I also move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me, to enable me to make a proposition?

Mr. CAMPBELL declined yielding the floor.

Mr. COBB. Why, the gentleman from Ohio has made two motions at once.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has been made, and takes precedence of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LETCHER. Is not my motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question, and so is the other, and one of higher dignity.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ASHE and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 50; not a sufficient number.

So the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PHELPS. I now move, Mr. Speaker, to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House that the special order may be postponed.

Mr. EDGERTON. I object to that motion. I have objection to the making of a special order in the matter.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

GRADUATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FULLER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1, to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, and to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, the pending question was the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to strike out all after the word "that," in the first line of the first section, to the word "all," in the first line of the seventh section. Upon that motion the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DISNEY. I rise to ask for information in regard to this bill; and, first of all, to enable me to arrive at the point I desire, I ask what the title of the bill is?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title.

The title was then read, (as inserted above.)

Mr. DISNEY. I now desire further to ask whether debate upon this bill has been limited by the order of the House; and if so, when and under what circumstances?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been limited under an order of the House, which will be read.

The order was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That House bill No. 1, being 'a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, and to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands;' and House bill No. 37, 'to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, be the special order of the day, in the order in which they were reported to the House, for Tuesday, the 14th of February next, and for each succeeding day, private bill days excepted, until disposed of.

Resolved, That all debate on said special order or bills shall terminate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, at three o'clock, p. m., on Tuesday, 21st of February next, when the House shall proceed to vote on the pending amendments, and such as may be offered to said bills, after which the committee shall rise and report to the House."

Mr. DISNEY. Exactly. I now raise the point of order which I have before indicated, and ask for the decision of the Chair upon it. I submit that the order of the House, which has just been read, limiting debate upon the bills designated, has been executed by the committee. The House having disposed of the homestead question, by a well settled principle of parliamentary law, no other bill proposing the same is before the House. I submit that question of order. But even should this be held otherwise—should this bill be now properly and legitimately before the committee, I submit that the order of the House limiting debate and requiring the committee to proceed to vote, &c., has been executed, and no longer applies to the bill under consideration. I make these two questions of order, therefore: First, that the House having disposed of one homestead bill, by a well settled principle of parliamentary law, no other homestead bill can come before the committee; and second, that the order limiting debate upon the homestead bill having been executed by the committee, does not apply to the pending bill, if it should be decided that this bill is now pending before us.

Mr. COBB. I suppose it is in-order to discuss this question. I think I can show the committee that the gentleman's questions of order will not hold good. I think the intelligence of the committee will bring them to that conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The order of the House is in the plural number, including bills No. 1 and 37. Bill No. 37 seems to have been disposed of; and bill No. 1 is still pending.

Mr. DISNEY. That is the very point I make. These bills are both upon the same subject, and I submit that the disposition of one disposes of them both.

The CHAIRMAN. Bill No. 1 has not been disposed of.

Mr. DISNEY. Am I to understand the Chair to rule that if there be forty homestead bills referred to this committee, this one having been disposed of, the others would still be before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that of the two bills designated in the order of the House which has been read by the Clerk, only one has been disposed of, and that debate is closed upon that bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It seems to me that the point raised by the gentleman from Ohio, is well taken. Those two bills relating to the same subject-matter, were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; one of them was taken up and disposed of, and it seems to me that in disposing of that bill the House disposed of the subject-matter, and that the other bill is no longer before us. I do not think it was the intention of the House to make this bill a special order. I know I had no such intention.

Mr. COBB. It was my intention to make it a special order. I had charge of the bill; and I think that was the intention of the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That was not my intention. I repeat, that the House having disposed of this subject-matter, it seems to me this bill should not come up in the committee. That is my opinion; and I think, upon reflection, the Chair will so rule.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to inquire whether the order of the House specifies both bills, No. 1 and No. 37?

Mr. COBB. Certainly it does.

Mr. PHELPS. Is bill No. 1 undisposed of?

Mr. COBB. Certainly it has not been disposed of. It is the bill now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not know whether I understood distinctly the decision made by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that one bill designated by the order of the House has been disposed of, and that the other is now before the committee, upon which debate has been terminated.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With a view of ascertaining the sense of the committee in reference to the question, whether both bills were disposed of by the House, I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. KEITT. I hope the Chair will again state the question upon which an appeal has been taken, so that the House may distinctly understand it.

The CHAIRMAN again stated the question.

Mr. COBB. I ask the Chair to permit me to make one other suggestion. The gentleman from North Carolina says he thinks it was not the intention of the House to make this bill a special order. I will say to that gentleman that the House has half a dozen times recognized this as a special order. It has been postponed from day to day as such.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COBB. I am aware that debate is not in order; but I wished to make the suggestion for the purpose of having the matter better understood by the committee.

The question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was declared to be legitimately before the committee.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I would be glad if the Chairman would state what really is the special order before the committee.

Mr. COBB. The question has been disposed of, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill now the special order before the committee, for the information of the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (No. 1) as previously inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment to strike out all that portion of the bill relating to homesteads.

Mr. DISNEY. Did I understand the Chair as embracing in his decision the second point of order which I made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as raising a second point of order.

Mr. DISNEY. I did present a second point.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his second point of order again.

Mr. DISNEY. Never mind. I will not press it.

Mr. DEAN. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, for the purpose of bringing it to a vote.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to add the following proviso at the end of the seventh section:

Provided, That no one person shall enter more than six hundred and forty acres of land under the provisions of this section.

Mr. COBB. With the gentleman's permission, I would state that there is in another part of the bill a provision that no person shall enter more than three hundred and twenty acres. That provision, I think, is much better than the one the gentleman has proposed. The bill is meant for the benefit of actual settlers and cultivators alone. If no gentleman wishes to amend that part of the section which precedes the seventh line, I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. DISNEY. I propose to amend it by striking it out.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is one of the manifold schemes presented to this House, by which to despoil the General Government of a portion of the public domain; and while it avoids the question of constitutional power, it is quite as indefensible, upon the ground of policy and expediency, as any other proposition which has been, or probably will be, submitted to the House.

But, sir, for me to attempt to show to this House all the objections that legitimately apply to this bill, within the limits of five minutes, would be simply absurd; and here I find myself in the position of opposing one of the most important bills that could possibly be brought before Congress; involving the disposition of hundreds of millions of acres of the public domain, without the power or the opportunity of giving to the House the reasons why such a bill should not be adopted. All that I can do, under the circumstances, is, of necessity, briefly and hurriedly to state a few of the prominent objections to that bill; and I can only do even that by snatches, by fits and starts, by offering amendments under the rule, pro forma, in order to dodge in, and steal in five minutes remarks at a time.

It is evident, then, that it is utterly impossible, in the present posture of the affairs in which this bill is placed, that either the House or the country can understand the reasons for or against this measure.

To begin, sir, this whole bill proceeds upon a false assumption with regard to the facts. It proceeds upon the idea that because lands have been offered for sale, and have remained a long time unsold, those lands are therefore of less value than the other lands owned by the Government, and ought to be put in market at a less price. Now, this is not true in point of fact. I have before me a document which goes to the point. In 1828, upon a proposition of this sort, the Land Office was called upon to give an exhibit of the number of acres of the public domain then in market and offered for sale, together with an estimate of the probable value. This document shows that at that time the amount of public land then in market and offered for sale was fifty millions five hundred thousand three hundred and thirty-four acres, estimated at a value of $20,700,566. Assuming the theory, upon which the bill now pending before the committee is based, that those lands were, of necessity, of a less value because they had remained in market for so long a period of time although offered for sale—

Mr. DUNHAM. If I understand the purport of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] he is opposed to the idea of graduating and reducing the price of the public lands. I must confess my astonishment at the position assumed by that gentleman, as he comes from a State where the public lands have been in market many years; and I presume a gentleman of his observation must have noticed the fact that many of these lands remained unsold. The gentleman correctly remarked, that it was utterly impossible, in the limited time of five minutes, to enter into an examination of the merits of a question of this kind. I think that the bill under consideration is a very important one, which, if passed, will result in a great benefit to the country. I believe that the price of lands which have remained in market for a great length of time should be reduced for one reason, among others, which I think is a very important one. It would cause the lands to be settled and cultivated. It would prove of incalculable advantage to have these lands settled as emigration progresses westward. In other words, when a district of country is open to settlement, inducements should be held out, as far as practicable, upon the part of the Government, to have such district of country entirely occupied and settled, before lands are brought into market in another district of the country. We all know, that as you go westward and open a new district of country for sale, that speculators go in and select all the best lands, leaving the refuse lands unsold. From this cause township and county organizations are prevented, and large quantities of second and third-rate lands are left unsold and unimproved. If you were to graduate and reduce the price of these second and third-rate lands, many settlers occupying the best lands would induce their friends to purchase and occupy these refuse lands, and bring them into a state of cultivation. But if persons are obliged to pay the same price for lands which have been culled over, year after year, as they would have to pay for first-rate lands by going a little further West, they will move on where they can make such selection; and in this way is the western country settled, by persons who select the best lands, and leave the second and third-rate lands unsold and unimproved. It seems to me to be the dictate of sound policy that we should graduate and reduce the price of the public lands, so as to bring them into market.

Mr. BISSELL. I propose to amend the amendment by substituting for the words "one dollar," in the fifth and sixth lines, the words "ninety cents."

I think that there never was a wiser proposition with regard to the public lands, presented to Congress, than that embraced in this seventh section. It is not a new proposition, but has been often urged upon the country by our wisest statesmen, and those best acquainted with the operations of our land system. It is well known that heretofore the public lands have been grasped by Congress with a strong and tight hand, or else this policy would have been defeated long ago. Does it not approach very near to absurdity for the Government to sell all these lands, of whatever quality, however or wherever situated, at the same price? Does any private individual act in that way, let his property be what it may?

But we are informed that the fact of these lands having been in market for a long time and unsold is conclusive evidence that they are less valuable than the others. That is not the argument which some of my friends have used in this Hall on other questions. We have insisted that when lands have been in market for ten, twenty, or thirty years, it is well for the Government to dispose of them in some way, though at a much less price than $1 25 per acre. I still adhere to that opinion. Why, Mr. Chairman, I think, besides, that that is the very way to test the value of these lands. If these shrewd men who desire lands for speculation or for cultivation have rambled over the territory for twenty or thirty years, selecting here and rejecting there, and have left this tract unsold for forty odd years, it is the best possible evidence that, for some reason or other, that particular region is less valuable than others.

Again, sir, we are told that this is the beginning of a system which is to deprive the Government of all benefit from the public lands. I was somewhat surprised to hear that objection coming from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY.] Heretofore he and I have urged upon this House the propriety of appropriating lands for the benefit of railroads, on the ground that the Government loses nothing by it, inasmuch as the alternate reserved sections were doubled in price. And I have urged that position honestly, as I believe the gentleman from Ohio has urged it, and I have voted accordingly. But what did we see here the other day in connection with this subject? After we had voted millions and millions of acres of the public lands for railroad purposes, mainly upon that ground, a bill came in here proposing to give to all the actual settlers on the reserved sections the right to enter their land at $1 25 per acre, the old price; and my friend from Ohio, who is now so much alarmed on account of the public lands, voted for that measure.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. I did not vote in favor of that bill.

Mr. BISSELL. I beg pardon. The gentleman from Ohio says he did not vote for the bill referred to. So far I stand corrected.

But, Mr. Chairman, there was another proposition before the House, which proposed, not to sell for a dollar, or fifty cents, or twenty-five cents, land to actual settlers, or to any others, but absolutely to give to every man who chooses to take possession of it one hundred and sixty acres of land. Now, Mr. Chairman, is it not a matter of surprise, after we have voted for a proposition like that, to hear it asserted that this bill, which proposes to fix the prices of the public lands more nearly in accordance with their value than these prices now are, is a measure which would inflict a loss on the General Government?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DISNEY. I would like to meet the gentleman from Illinois in every point connected with this matter. I have studied it, sir, in all its aspects and in all its bearings, and I am confident that I can satisfy the House and the country that such a bill as this before us is entirely wrong in principle.

Mr. Chairman, when I was broken off before in my remarks, I was reading a document which is a full answer to the friends of the measure. I will have it read now—

Mr. COBB, (interrupting.) I think we had better give the gentleman from Ohio half an hour to finish what he has to say on the subject. We might as well do so, and it would be more satisfactory to the whole of us.

Several MEMBERS. Yes; give him half an hour.

Some, however, objected.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, the document which I was on the point of reading at the expiration of my time is itself an answer to the arguments of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.] That document shows that in 1828 there were fifty millions of acres of the public lands unsold, which had remained in market for a long period of time, and which were estimated then by the Land Office at the value of $20,700,000. And yet, in 1840, only twelve years subsequently to the date of this statement, nineteen millions two hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and forty-one of these same fifty millions of acres—barely exceeding one third of the quantity—had been sold, and yet this one third of the quantity brought $24,053,032—$4,000,000 more than the whole fifty millions of acres had been estimated at in 1828. This document of itself, then, is an answer to the argument of the gentleman from Illinois.

I repeat again, this document establishes the fact that the fact of land having remained a long time in market unsold, is no evidence of the want of value, or want of fertility in the soil. Various other circumstances enter into the result, and determine the value of these different parcels of the public domain. The general improvement of the country and the increase of the settlements are to be taken into account. Why, it may be that a poor, barren, and sterile soil may become valuable on account of the building materials upon it, which are called into use by the increasing demand for them as the country fills up. It may be that the very poorest soils may be enhanced in value twenty-fold by reasons of improvements which may be made in their vicinity, as has been the case in neighborhoods where railroads have been run, or are proposed to be run. A gentleman the other day mentioned a case in reference to land within his own knowledge, in the vicinity of which a railroad had been located, which land previously could not have been sold for fifty cents an acre, but cannot now be bought for twenty-five dollars an acre. Such instances are not rare.

Again, look at the absurdity of the policy. Year after year you are surveying and throwing into the market for sale three times the quantity of public lands which can, by any possibility, be taken up by the demand of the country. Your measure of policy is to make the supply greater than the demand; and consequently, as a matter of necessity, you will always have a large surplus of land on hand unsold, and which has been in market a considerable period of time for want of a purchaser. And yet while pursuing this policy of throwing upon the market a superabundance of land each and every year, you, at the same time, propose to adopt a policy which will reduce the price of this land after it has been in market a short time. You over-supply the market, and so keep it, and then upon that the excess is not sold, because it is of less value than the part sold.

If it be the true policy of the country to reduce the price of these lands, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] stop your present policy of surveying large additional portions of the public domain, and throwing that upon the market. The two systems are incompatible, and cannot work in harmony. Arrest the extension of your settlements, and then you will be able to dispose of the unsold land in the older districts.

I repeat, while you are continuing to inundate the market with a supply of the public domain largely exceeding the demand, it is absurd to adopt, upon the other hand, a policy which will reduce the price of those lands after they have been in market a short period of time.

Again, take the case of my own State. There are two hundred thousand acres of land remaining unsold in that State, as good in quality, if not far better, than much of the land in the western States, and readily sought by purchasers. These lands have been in market for twenty to thirty years; and according to this bill they would have to be offered for sale at from twelve and a half to twenty-five cents per acre.

Mr. DUNHAM here obtained the floor.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. DUNHAM. I will.

Mr. BISSELL. I find, by consulting the record which is before me, that upon the proposition to reduce the price of these reserved lands from $2 50 to $1 25 per acre, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is recorded as voting in the affirmative.

Mr. DISNEY. I can only say in reply, if I am so recorded, I never intended to give any such vote.

Mr. BISSELL. However that may be, here is the record, and there is the gentleman.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move to amend by striking out "one dollar," and inserting "eighty cents."

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. DUNHAM. I have no time to spare out of my five minutes; but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to say a word in relation to the bill on which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] said the gentleman from Ohio had voted in the affirmative. That was a bill, if I understand it, applying only to lands in Arkansas upon the borders of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. BISSELL. It applies to all persons living on these reserved sections.

Mr. PERKINS. The principles of the bill may be general in their application.

Mr. BISSELL. They are.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am compelled to claim the floor. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose what I have to say will change the course of a single member of this committee in reference to this bill; but, nevertheless, it seems to me that the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] require that some explanation should be given to the members from the older States.

Now, it is very true that some of these lands, which have been in market for many years, are finally sold out at the Government price. But I have in my mind tracts of land in the district which I had the honor to represent in the last Congress, and in the district which I have the honor to represent now, which have remained in market twenty, thirty, and some of them forty years, and which yet remain unsold. They have been taken up in small quantities, year after year, but large tracts in my district still remain unsold; and at the Government price of $1 25 an acre, perhaps will not be taken up for twenty years to come.

Now, suppose the prices of these lands had been reduced twenty years ago; or suppose some such system as is now proposed in this bill had been adopted, some of them would have been taken up immediately, most of them would have been taken up ten years ago, and but very few would now remain unsold; and these lands which have, for thirty or forty years remained an uncultivated waste, would have been cultivated and settled. Would it not have been much better, not only for the district of country in which the lands lie, but much better, also, for the interests of the General Government, that they should have been sold at a reduced price, and the revenues arising therefrom put into the public Treasury, and appropriated to defray the expenses of the Government for the last twenty or thirty years, rather than that they should have remained a wilderness, as they are now?

I will tell you how it is that these lands are taken up at all now. There are farmers who have large farms with but little timber upon them, and find it desirable to add land containing timber, although it may be uncultivable, and so a few acres are in this way taken up. Or perhaps some railroad or a canal is built in the vicinity, and in this manner lands which were before worthless, become valuable in consequence of the improvements. Now, would it not have been much better if, instead of waiting for these improvements to be made, the price of these lands had been reduced twenty or thirty years ago, so that they would have been taken up, thereby giving you not only the use of the proceeds of their sale, but by their settlement, increasing your revenue by increasing the commerce of the country? By such course these improvements might have been made fifteen or twenty years sooner. I submit to you whether it is good policy for the Government to keep these lands, now perfectly worthless, uncultivated, thus preventing their being taken up—thus retarding the settlement of the country for forty or fifty years, for the sake of getting at last $1 25 an acre for them?

Mr. DISNEY. One word in reference to the bill for which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSSELL] says I voted. I have just looked at it. That bill was in relation to a different principle, as I find, entirely different from any here involved. It was in relation to the recognition of a presumptive right. That I probably did vote for. But I will not discuss that now, sir. It is a perfect fallacy for the gentleman from Illinois, and others who have discussed this subject, to suppose that they can increase the permanent demand of the public for these lands by any legislation upon the part of Congress. You cannot increase that demand ad libitum. You may, from time to time, produce a fever in the market which will, for a time, cause an unnatural demand for land; but if you will take a series of years, you will find that the demand for the public domain for the purpose of cultivation is regulated by your population, and the wants of that population. And if those lands, which the gentleman says have been unsold, were sold, other lands in the newer States of the Union would have remained unsold. It was a question with the purchasers whether they should select the lands there or the lands at some other place; and although you may stimulate the demand by the reduction of the price, yet, I repeat that, taking a series of years, whether you put up or put down the price of the public domain, the demand for it will remain the same, other circumstances remaining the same. And, sir, it is a neglect in attending to this fundamental and important principle which leads these gentlemen into the error which they evince in regard to this subject.

I said, when I was up before, that the fact of land having been offered for a long time for sale without a purchaser, was no evidence of value. Why, turn to the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. In the last one which he has submitted to Congress, you find that in the State of Illinois, the very State represented by my friend here, returns of land sold not only for $1 25 per acre, but above that price, up to $2 50 per acre—land which had been in market without finding a purchaser for thirteen years; in other cases for nine years; some nineteen years; some twenty-eight years; and others as high as thirty-four years. They had been in market without finding a purchaser at $1 25 per acre; yet in less than twelve months they were sold at $2 50 per acre.

The defeat of this bill is not alone, however, in the error of the principle of which I have spoken. It is objectionable in various other respects. Why, think of the immense amount of labor, if at all practicable, which would be required to classify all these lands throughout the entire public domain of this great Republic. Many of these lands, and part of tracts, have been offered for sale at different periods. One part of a tract was offered in market at one period, and another part at another period; and how are you to classify them? At the Land Office they tell me that the work would be interminable, if not impossible.

Mr. COBB. There is a map there showing the precise time all lands were put into market.

Mr. DISNEY. I have just said that parts of a tract have been offered for sale at one point of time, and other parts at other points; and how unpracticable will be the classification. I have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I will send to the Clerk's desk that it may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

The question was then taken on Mr. DUNHAM's amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to strike out the words "twelve and a half cents per acre," and insert in lieu thereof "six and a quarter cents per acre." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman must apply to the amendment now pending.

Mr. PHILLIPS. What is the amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to strike out "one dollar" and to insert "eight cents."

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, I move, pro forma, to strike out "eight" and insert "fifty."

Mr. Chairman, the situation of the new States in reference to their public lands is well known. The Government of the United States is the largest landed proprietor within their borders. Those lands are reserved from taxation. They are held by the Government under a species of mortmain, or dead hand, and it is literally a "dead hand" placed on the energies of the people of the States in which those lands lie. Sir, in England, from which we derive our laws and even our prejudices, there is a hostility against corporations holding lands to an unlimited extent; and the new States of this Union are subject to the operation of precisely similar laws; for this great political corporation of the United States holds in mortmain a large portion of the lands in those States of this Confederacy known as the land States. Why, you cannot get the Legislature of one of those States to pass an act chartering a corporation in which one of the first provisions is not that such corporation shall not hold more than a certain quantity of land. This is because it is well known that the fact of the ownership of such lands within the country is a disaster to the people of the States in which those lands lie.

Now, I say that this Government owes it to the States in which these lands lie to deal with them in a fair, a just, nay, more, sir, in a liberal spirit. It never was intended that the Federal Government should become the perpetual owner, or the owner for centuries, of lands lying within the limits and jurisdiction of the sovereign States of the Union.

Sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] says that if you will keep these lands long enough they will some day become of value. He refers to documents to show that lands which were offered for sale thirty years ago, and could not be sold, can be sold at the present day, in consequence of the improvements which are now projected through the country; and he tells us that if the Government will hold on, with the grasping spirit of the miser, to these lands which have been offered for sale for thirty years, and have not yet been improved, in thirty, or sixty, or ninety, or one hundred and twenty years hence, they will become valuable, in consequence of improvements then projected. Sir, is this the manner in which the Government is to deal with the States in which these lands lie? Is the Government to keep the lands perpetually bound up in the hope that some thirty, sixty, or ninety years hence there will be some improvements running through that waste country which will then give value to the lands? No, sir; I say that it is the duty of this Government to act in a different spirit. If the lands within those States have been offered for sale for thirty years, and there has been no offer to purchase them, it is the best evidence that those lands are not worth the price asked for them. Apply to your public lands precisely the same principle that you would apply to the sale of any other commodity in the market—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DISNEY. I must express my surprise that a gentleman of the ability of the honorable gentleman from Alabama should get up here and present such arguments as those which he has just presented. He contends that the fact of the land having been offered for sale for a long period of time, and having no purchaser, is an evidence of its want of value. Now, that would be true if the purchaser had no choice, but was compelled to take that land or none. But I put it to the gentleman whether it is at all conclusive on that point, when the purchaser has the option of either buying that land at that price, or going to a different part of the country, and selecting other lands at the same price.

Mr. PHILLIPS, (interrupting.) I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if he had goods to dispose of, calicoes for instance—and should expose them for sale thirty years, at a dollar a yard, without receiving anything for them—would it not be good evidence that the calicoes were not worth the price asked?

Mr. DISNEY. I will repeat that the argument offered by the gentleman from Alabama would be true, if there were no choice to be made and purchases could not be effected elsewhere. It might be fair to infer from the fact that the unsold lands were not worth as much as some other lands of the Government, but certainly it is no evidence that the unsold land is not worth $1 25 per acre.

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama, here interrupted, occupying the remainder of the five minutes of Mr. DISNEY by expressing his dissent from the views of that gentleman, and advocating the principles of the bill.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. COBB. I will move, with the assent of the Committee on Public Lands, an amendment which will answer some of the objections urged by my honorable colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] It is to strike out the words "one dollar," and insert in lieu thereof, "sixty-two and a half cents."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] in his proposition, moves to strike out the entire section of this bill. The purpose of that proposition is to defeat the objects contemplated by the bill. If I did not know the gentleman from Ohio as well as I do—if I had not so long observed his course in the Committee on Public Lands—I might have mistrusted the particular object that he has in view. But, sir, when I look at the history of the country, and find that measures were introduced here—coming from the State of Ohio—at the last session of Congress, proposing to give to that State all the public land within her jurisdiction, and when I recollect the movements that have taken place in this House at the present session, proposing to give to the State of Ohio all the lands within her jurisdiction—when I look at all this, I say, I would—did I not know the gentleman as well as I do—attribute his opposition to this measure to the ground that he expects his State to get all the public land within her limits without having to pay anything at all for it.

Sir, when you reduce the price of the public lands in accordance with the provisions of this bill, you bring the lands of the State of Ohio into market, and into speedy market; and in a very few years—even probably before that policy can prevail to any great extent—you get the money out of the State of Ohio for the lands within her jurisdiction at the graduated price.

What does the gentleman from Ohio propose by defeating this measure? He proposes, Mr. Chairman, to do this—or at least the practical effect of its defeat will be—to keep the public lands at $1 25 per acre, and thereby to keep them in the same condition of wildness and unprofitableness in which they have been from the organization of the land system of the country to the present time. Yes, sir, that is it. Why, there is nothing but pine deserts and mountains now vacant, in my country. My father emigrated to it, and I was raised almost in the midst of these lands. Since the good lands of that country have been taken up, what has been the result? Why, the poor man goes and locates a quarter section, or forty acres of land there, which is admitted not to have been worth $1 25 per acre, the best of it, from the very fact that it has been in the market for thirty years—he goes there, I say; he settles on the land; he builds a house, and clears ten or fifteen acres of land; and then, sir, one of the Shylocks, whom the gentleman from Ohio would protect, buys up the tract at $1 25 per acre, comes and turns this man out of his house and home because he is not able to pay $1 25 per acre for the whole tract. What do these Shylocks pay that price for? Is it for the original intrinsic value of the land? No, sir; it is for the labor which the poor man has expended upon it; and that is the very policy which the defeat of this bill will perpetuate.

I did not purpose to-day to allude to this matter; but I was led into these remarks. I would rather lose my eye than neglect to utter the sentiments which I feel in regard to the protection of the citizen and of the man who contributes all his might to raise his house, and clear and cultivate his farm for the support of his family. I will state before the discussion closes, the effect of this state of facts. I will point you to the district of country lying within the State of Mississippi, and I will also call upon the gentleman from Mississippi to testify, in relation to the lands which were reserved by the Chickasaw Indians, when they ceded that part of the country to the United States. The provisions of the cession required the lands to be sold at graduated prices. What has been the result of this wise provision? Why, the lands in that region of country have been—almost every acre—taken up.

Mr. DISNEY. I now ask that the letter, which I before sent to the Chair, may be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

LAND OFFICE, March 29, 1854.

SIR: In accordance with your request, I have the honor to inclose you a statement exhibiting the quantity of public lands in market and unsold on the 30th June, 1828, in the several land districts therein mentioned, the aggregate value of those lands as assessed or estimated by the land officers, the quantity of those lands sold between the 30th June, 1828, and the 30th September, 1840, with the amount received for them.

I would have been much pleased to bring this statement up to date, but the pressure of business is such that I find it wholly impossible to do so, in view of the great amount of labor involved in it.

This statement, embracing a period including the most prosperous, as well as the most adverse years for the land system, is probably as fair as any that could be prepared. It includes districts in nine of the land States, and therefore the results are not traceable to any local causes.

To attempt to establish this system will involve immense labor, as it will require an entire classification of all the public lands of the United States, and in many cases, parts of the same section even have been offered at different and remote periods.

The minimum price of the public lands, $1 25 per acre, is merely nominal. Analyse it as you will, it will be perceived that a very slight amount of industry will pay for it. If it be only pine land, an hour's work each day, after the labor of the farm is over, will enable him to make shingles, staves, hoops, or lumber, in a short time, sufficient to pay for it. And if it be prairie, the crop of a single season will support his family and pay for his land. If, however, it is thought one season is too short, extend the period to two, three, four, or five years, in which preëmptors can pay for their lands.

The only plan yet presented for fixing the graduated prices, is the length of time the lands have been in market; and the results in the Chickasawcession have been referred to as evincing the efficient working of the system.

In that cession there was comparatively little land, and it was in the midst of a densely populated community. The surrounding lands were kept up to the minimum of $1 25 per acre, and, of course, the readier sale of those at a less price. They were offered in small parcels, as wanted, and in that way the best lands were first taken, then the next, &c.; and there would seem to be more reason for reducing the price of the less valuable or refuse land.

But the graduating principle, if applied to the whole of the public domain, would not resemble this in a single feature.

For many years about ten millions of acres have been surveyed and brought into market each year, and that, too, with a full knowledge that from one to three millions would supply the entire demand. Thus about four fifths of the land each year was left unpurchased; and it would be absurd to suppose that there was not much, very much, as good land remaining as any that had been sold. Moreover, the lapse of time, that is supposed to dispose of all the good land, enhances the value of the poorer lands. As the settlements extend and become dense, rocky lands, wholly worthless for cultivation, become valuable for building materials. So also of sandy, gravelly, and poor pine lands. Suppose an acre of pine lands would grow three hundred trees, allowing considerably more than ten feet square for each tree, and that each tree would yield an average of three hundred feet of one inch plank, it would amount to ninety thousand feet of lumber. This divided into $1 25 per acre, would make the cost to the settler but little over the one hundredth part of a mill per foot, a mere nominal price, while the lumber would yield a handsome profit, and the scrub lands would be valuable for hoop-poles, if for nothing else.

But if the graduating system be introduced, the first settlers will have to pay full price for their lands; while those who come after them will get them at less price. This, instead of promoting the settlement of the lands, will have a tendency to retard them, as each year's delay would, for some or other of them, reduce the price.

To you, sir, who are so intimately acquainted with the operations of the land system, the inclosed statement and above suggestions will, I am sure, satisfy you of the fallacy of the graduating process.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN WILSON, Commissioner.

Hon. D. P. DISNEY, House of Representatives.

Mr. ROWE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BOGOCCK. Upon that question I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and VAIL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, a further count not being demanded. So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. FULLER] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 1) granting portions of the public lands to actual settlers thereon, and to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled, bills of the following titles, which were signed by the Speaker:

A bill for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army;

A bill for the relief of William B. Edwards; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Isaac P. Simonton.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BISSELL. As it is not quite the usual adjourning hour, I move that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. KERR. I believe that I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina was recognized by the Chair, and he yielded for the report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. KERR. I merely rose for the purpose of moving that the House adjourn. [Laughter.]

[Here a message was received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a certain bill, and asked the concurrence of the House therein.]

Mr. PHELPS. I would ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion to adjourn, so that we may go to the business on the Speaker's table, and refer the Senate bills lying there to the appropriate committee.

Mr. KERR. If there be a disposition to do anything, I withdraw the motion to adjourn with great pleasure.

Mr. BISSELL. I move that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the standing committees of the House be called on for reports. What is the use of referring bills after bills to committees when they have large numbers of reports ready to submit to the House without being able to do so? Let us first get rid of what we have before you give us others.

The SPEAKER. If the House decline to go to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, it will be the duty of the Chair to call on committees for reports.

The question was taken, and the House agreed to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill from the Senate "to authorize the State of Wisconsin to select the residue of land to which she is entitled under the act of 8th August, 1846, for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and, on motion by Mr. PHELPS, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I suppose from the decision of the Chair made yesterday, that the bill granting to the States of Indiana and Illinois a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of the Indiana and Illinois Central railway would be the first business in order when we proceeded to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that a postponement of the consideration of the bill yesterday when it was up to a particular day, would make it the first business in order when the House next went to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table; but it was not postponed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it not true that the House adjourned yesterday pending the motion to lay that bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is true that a motion was made by some gentleman to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Indiana, however, moved to postpone its consideration to a particular day. Some other gentleman then moved to lay the bill on the table. The House then adjourned, leaving all these motions pending. It is, nevertheless, the opinion of the Chair, that the adjournment of the House, without postponing the consideration of the bill to a particular day, requires it, according to a rule to which the Chair can refer if it be necessary, to take its place on the Speaker's table in the fourth class. The Chair said yesterday, that if the House postponed the consideration of the bill to a particular day, the bill would, after that day arrived, be the first business in order when the House proceeded to consider the business on the Speaker's table. That is what the Chair intended to say yesterday. But the House did not make that order.

The gentleman from Indiana will recollect that he asked the Chair what would be the condition of the bill if its consideration were postponed to a day certain? The Chair replied that when that day should arrive, it would be the first business in order when the House proceeded to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to make one other inquiry, and then I shall have done. Do I understand the Speaker to state now that the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands does not change its present condition?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not change the condition of a bill taken from the Speaker's table, whatever effect it might have upon a bill reported from a committee. The practice in regard to bills reported from committees has been uniform. When a motion to commit is made, and left pending, it keeps the bill as the first business in order in the morning hour. But that has never been the practice in regard to the disposition of bills on the Speaker's table; nor is there any reason, under the rules, for such a practice—for it is only a practice.

Mr. HUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana will withdraw that motion. We can refer a number of bills in a very few moments.

Mr. HUNT. I have no objection; but I saw there was a very evident indisposition to do business.

Mr. PHELPS. Oh, yes, we can refer bills.

Mr. HUNT. Well, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The following Senate bills were then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by their respective titles, and severally referred as indicated below:

An act to regulate the pay and increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act for the relief of Manuel Hernandez. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act for the relief of Sylvanus Culver. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act for the relief of G. N. Baptiste Beaubien.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to make a single remark in reference to the bill, the title of which has just been read. It does not relate to public lands; nor does it properly come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Private Land Claims; but it relates to a portion of the old fort Beaubien, a military post in the city of Chicago, which was appropriated, some forty odd years ago, for the site of the fort, and has been reserved for that purpose ever since. I think, therefore, that the proper direction of this bill is to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It was so referred.

An act for the relief of Thomas Rhodes. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

An act for the relief of Robert Joynes. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

An act to change the name of the bark Abeona to Mount Vernon. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act for the relief of John McAvoy. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

INDIGENT INSANE.

The SPEAKER next announced Senate bill, making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons.

Mr. BISSELL. I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, in what condition that bill now stands.

The SPEAKER. It is open to commitment or to amendment. The Chair understands that a demand for the previous question is pending upon it.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope the demand for the previous question will be seconded.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman from Missouri withdraw that motion, until we second the demand for the previous question on this bill?

Mr. PHELPS. No; better let the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon, at a quarter past three o'clock, p. m., adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

The report was ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICE IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives "establishing a land office in the lower peninsula of Michigan," have directed me to report it back, and recommend its passage. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and consider the bill at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill.

It proposes to create a new land district in the lower peninsula of Michigan, to be called the Sheboygan district, for which a register and receiver are to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 13, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

EXPLORATION OF THE AMAZON.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to make a report to the House. Some time ago a resolution was referred to that committee—

Mr. GREY. Will the gentleman from Kentucky withhold his report for a moment, to enable me to offer a resolution of inquiry which will not occupy the House more than a minute or two?

Mr. STANTON. The matter which I have in hand can be disposed of in a single minute.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, a resolution was sent some time ago from this House to the Committee on Printing, directing that committee to inquire into the propriety of printing twenty thousand additional copies of Lieutenants Herndon and Gibbon's report of a survey of the river Amazon. The committee have instructed me to report it back, with a resolution authorizing the printing of ten thousand, instead of twenty thousand extra copies.

The following resolution was thereupon read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That there be printed ten thousand additional copies of the report of the surveys and explorations of the river Amazon, with the plates and maps accompanying, by Lieutenants Herndon and Gibbon—two hundred and fifty of them for distribution by Lieutenant Herndon, two hundred and fifty for distribution by Lieutenant Gibbon, and the remainder for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. BOYCE. I move, Mr. Speaker, to amend that resolution by increasing the number of additional copies from ten thousand to twenty thousand.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that there has been ordered by the House at the present session of Congress ten thousand copies of this work, which have not been as yet printed; and this resolution provides for an additional number, making the whole number that will have been ordered to be printed twenty thousand. It seems to me that that is as many as the House should order. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from South Carolina will withdraw his motion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] who reported this resolution, when we may expect to get the copies which have already been ordered?

Mr. STANTON. The first part of the work, embracing Herndon's report, has been printed upon an order of the Senate; but the report of Lieutenant Gibbon was not made to this House until within a recent period—only a few weeks ago. It is now in the hands of the printer, who will proceed with the utmost dispatch in the execution of the work.

Mr. BOYCE. I understand that none of the Gibbon's report has been yet ordered to be printed. This is a very useful work, containing a large amount of useful information in reference to a region of country heretofore but little known; and I think that twenty thousand extra copies will not be too many. I therefore adhere to the motion which I made.

Mr. STANTON. Gentlemen of the House seem to be laboring under an erroneous idea in regard to this subject. The report of Lieutenant Herndon has been published under an order of the Senate, but not embracing the report of Lieutenant Gibbon, which was not then finished. The resolution of this House, passed some time since; directed ten thousand extra copies of that report to be published, and also provided that Lieutenant Gibbon's report should, when made, be included. That report has only been completed within the last three or four weeks. It has been laid upon your table, and ordered to be printed. The extra number now proposed to be published will contain both of these reports. They are very valuable, and afford rich and interesting information in reference to the country watered by the river Amazon.

The resolution which was passed a short time ago provided for the publication of ten thousand copies, and the resolution which I have offered now provides for an additional ten thousand. But the cost of printing the additional ten thousand will not be as great as that of the first ten thousand, as the original composition of the work will be charged to the previous ten thousand. I call for the previous question.

Mr. HIESTER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky withdraw his demand for a moment?

Mr. STANTON. I will, if the gentleman will renew the call.

Mr. HIESTER. I will. I desire to know from the gentlemen of the Committee on Printing when we shall probably receive this work, if it be ordered, or those which have been ordered?

Mr. STANTON. I am informed that the manuscript is now in the hand of the printer, and he is at work upon it. No doubt it will be speedily executed.

Mr. HIESTER. Can the gentleman from Kentucky form any idea, from the information he has upon the subject, when the printer will be likely to finish the work, and have it ready for delivery? That is what we are particularly anxious to know.

Mr. MURRAY. The printer of the House has now commenced printing Lieutenant Herndon's report. He has put a large force upon it, and will have it ready very soon for delivery. He has provided himself with an additional number of presses, and the extra documents will be got along with as fast as possible.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to say a word as to the time when these documents will probably be delivered.

Mr. HIESTER. I believe I am entitled to the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JONES. I will detain the House but for a moment, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. HIESTER, (retaining the floor.) I will give way for a moment.

Mr. JONES. I think we may very reasonably expect, from the number of copies we are ordering, and the amount of printing which we are having done, that those gentlemen who shall not have the good fortune to be reelected to the next Congress, will have the pleasure of finding the documents, which they now order, delivered to their successors in the next Congress, to be distributed by them among the people.

Mr. DEAN. Then we are not interested in the question.

Mr. HIESTER. If what the gentleman from Tennessee says shall prove true, then these documents will go into our districts, and that is where we desire that they shall go. The publication of this and other works is not for our individual benefit, but for that of the people of the country.

As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STAN-TON] withdrew the call for the previous question merely to allow me to make an inquiry of him, I now renew the demand.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was put; and, upon a division, eighty-five members rose in the affirmative.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment.

Upon seconding the demand for the yeas and nays, only seventeen members voted therefor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The division was then completed, and twenty-three members rose in the negative—no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was put; and a call of the House was refused.

The SPEAKER then counted the House, and declared a hundred and thirty-six members to be present.

The question was again put; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, noes 34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. JONES. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of SIDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed a bill to establish additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota.

Also, that he had approved and signed sundry private bills.

Also, transmitting a communication in writing.]

POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. OLDS obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. GREY, who said: Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all orders, rules, or regulations adopted by him, which prevent or deny to the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the privilege of going into the public rooms of the Post Office Department during office hours, and of then and there examining the public records of that Department.

2. Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to abolish all rules, orders, or regulations, which prevent or denies the privilege to the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, or any one of them, from going into the public rooms in the Post Office Department during office hours, and then and there examining such public records in the presence, and with the assistance of the clerk having charge of them, as such member may desire.

That he also abolish all rules, orders, or regulations by which the clerks, or either of them, are prevented or restrained from affording to any member of said committee such information during those examinations as the public records of the Post Office Department will enable him to give.

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

Mr. GREY. I am satisfied, if the gentleman will allow me to explain, that he will withdraw his objection, and that the House will unanimously adopt the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to hear the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREY. The recommendation of the honorable Postmaster General to Congress to sanction and ratify a contract which he had, without legal authority, entered into for transporting and expediting the mails between Montgomery, Alabama, and New Orleans, by way of Mobile, was referred, by a vote of this House, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, (of which I am a member,) for a full and careful investigation, and to report to this House all the facts relating thereto. As soon as possible after the reference to our committee, I introduced, and this House adopted, resolutions calling upon the Postmaster General for information bearing on the proposition, (which was on the records of the Department.)

I am prepared to show that the information furnished by the Postmaster General in this, and in other instances, is not full and accurate—that it is contradictory. The statement of facts in the letter from the Postmaster General cannot be reconciled with the facts stated in other official documents before the committee upon this and other subjects.

As a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I went to the Post Office Department, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts correctly, and why it was that the letter and report were not more explicit and full, and did not agree with the facts as they actually existed, and why the different portions of them did not agree with each other. I charge no intentional fraud on the Postmaster General. But I will state facts, and can prove that there are very important omissions and mistakes in that report, and in other official reports from that Department, which assured me that they were not wholly reliable. I stated to the Second Assistant Postmaster General, at the Department, who is at the head of the Contract Office, and, in that capacity, has the control of all this information, that I wanted to go to the clerks' rooms to examine the official papers and records of the Department, the correspondence, &c., in relation to this matter, which had been referred to our committee. Yes, sir, I only desired to see and examine the "official public records." I wished to examine no private, confidential, or secret records.

I presume there could be none such in the Post Office Department in relation to a matter which the Postmaster General had sent to Congress for investigation, and for their action upon it. Mr. Dundas, the Second Assistant, informed me that the Postmaster General had adopted orders, or rules and regulations, which prevented any person whatever from going into the clerks' rooms for the purpose of examining the papers and records. I expressed my great surprise that any such regulation should have been made; that heretofore no such obstacles had been thrown in the way of members of Congress, or others desiring to examine the "official records" of that Department. I knew, moreover, that it had been the custom with members of Congress, with contractors, and with gentlemen disconnected with the Government, to go to the clerks' rooms and obtain information from the public records of the Post Office Department. I never before heard of that privilege being denied to any one. I have heard that one, or all of these orders, had been made since this matter, relative to the Montgomery, Mobile, and New Orleans mail contracts, was referred to Congress. The Second Assistant Postmaster General told me that if I could tell him what papers I desired to see, that he would have them brought down into his room, where I might look at them; but that I could not, under the rules adopted by the present Postmaster General, go up into the clerks' rooms and examine them there.

Mr. Speaker, there may be, and I know there is, great propriety in withholding from public inspection the records of the State Department of our Government, which has charge of all our foreign relations, and very many important matters of negotiation and arrangement, which should be made public only at the discretion of the President and his Cabinet advisers.

But, sir, the present is, I presume, the first Postmaster General who ever asked for investigation and action by Congress upon his conduct, and at the same time denied to any of its members the opportunity for a full and fair examination of the public "official records" upon which he had based his action.

Sir, I wanted all the facts on file in the Department which might tend to enable me to ascertain the untold truth, and understand fully every fact in relation to the subject which this House had referred to me as one of that committee. It was impossible for me to tell exactly in what book, or under what head or particular title I could ascertain the information. But I knew I could ascertain all by examining the books, papers, &c., and from conversation with the clerks in their rooms, when all the records were in sight of them. Moreover, sir, every lawyer understands how difficult it is to get the whole truth out of an unwilling or overwary witness—out of a witness under duress, as it were. I know that if there has been violation of law, of official propriety, or if there has been any juggling or trickery, or combination in regard to that mail contract, by which the Government Treasury is about to lose thousands of dollars, that (although the head of that Department will be held responsible to public censure) yet, those who understand the internal regulation of the business in that Department, will hold the Second Assistant Postmaster General as the one, of all others, most guilty.

Suppose, sir, the Second Assistant, who has charge of the "Contract Office" of that Department, had brought in one of the "contract clerks," and sat him down with the books and papers in his room, and under his constant watch and observation—a clerk, sir, who was dependent upon the favor and good-will of the Second Assistant for his office, and for the daily support of his wife and children—one in such a position possibly might not be so ready and willing to volunteer full and complete information, or suggest how, or where, among the records, I might most readily obtain facts.

But, sir, if I could have thus obtained all the information, and read every line, and every word, and ascertained the feelings and the motives which prompted every one connected with those transactions, I would have scorned indignantly the impudent and insulting proposition that I might be graciously permitted to look over the "official public records" of that Department, and talk to a clerk about them, provided I would do so under the ear and watchings of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Well, sir, when informed of this new regulation for hiding and concealing, I addressed a note to the Postmaster General asking "official copies of those orders, rules, or regulations, that I might understand how far I had a right to go, and intended to violate none of the regulations of the Department. To that note, written several days ago, I have received no response.

Mr. Speaker, this case requires speedy action, if any at all. It is pending before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I have endeavored to hasten a decision upon it, but have failed in my efforts to get the necessary information from the Postmaster General, and therefore ask, in the first resolution, that the House will direct copies of all such orders and regulations to be furnished by him to this branch of Congress.

The second resolution directs merely that the Postmaster General shall annul any order of his that would prevent any member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads from going to the Department during office hours, and examining, in the presence of the clerks who have charge of them, the official records of the Department; and also to abolish any order he may have made which would tend to restrain the clerks from giving information in relation to the official documents in the Post Office Department.

Such, sir, is the sum and substance of those resolutions. Will this Democratic Congress demand investigation of matters of legislation by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and permit the Postmaster General to withhold from them the information essential to their guidance to correct conclusions? Will you, sir, tolerate in the Postmaster General and his subordinates, their arrogant assumption that they will stifle and smother investigation by locking their doors, withholding the "public records," and thereby deprive every member of the committee from hunting out and obtaining for himself full and reliable "official facts?"

Sir, if honesty, integrity, and justice has been observed, is it possible that there can be any information on the records of the Post Office Department which ought to be concealed from Congress? How is it possible that any member could obtain from the official papers there that which ought not to be known to all?

Now, Mr. Speaker, although, perhaps, not legitimately before the House, I desire to say one word in regard to the mail contracts for carrying the mails daily from Montgomery by Mobile to New Orleans. They were made in 1850 to terminate 1st of July, 1854. The "time" from Montgomery to New Orleans, by the original contracts, was fifty-eight hours—their aggregate cost $56,175 per annum.

The same contracts now cost the Government $101,300, and require fifty-nine hours from Montgomery to New Orleans, and yet only once-a-day mail service is now given from Montgomery to New Orleans. Yes, sir, these "extra allowances," which now swell the cost of those contracts up to $101,300, instead of $56,175, (their original cost,) were all granted, I believe, (except $400,) under the pretense of expediting that "great mail," and now it requires one hour longer to go from Montgomery to New Orleans than it did by the original contracts at about one half the present cost.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Kentucky that he is not in order in indulging in his present course of remark.

Mr. GREY. Then, sir, I am through.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to have these resolutions read over again.

The SPEAKER. They are not before the House, as objection was made to their introduction.

Mr. GREY. If in order, then, I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to introduce them.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order.

Mr. GREY. I hope there will be no longer objection to the introduction of the resolutions. I rise to a question of order. I understand that there is no objection to their introduction.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] asked leave of the House to explain. At the outset of his remarks he expressed the hope that the objection would be withdrawn, and that the House would give him an opportunity to indulge in an explanation. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] as making the objection to the introduction of the resolutions.

Mr. STANTON. I did not object.

Mr. PHELPS. I made objection to the introduction of the resolutions.

Mr. GREY. Mr. Speaker, I now rise to a privileged question. I will state to the House, that I find it impossible for me to investigate and show all the facts connected with this matter of legislation, in consequence of not being able to consult and examine official records; and I therefore ask, most respectfully, that this House will excuse me from acting any longer on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and, sir, I do assure this House and my friends that I earnestly ask, and sincerely desire, this favor be extended to me.

I ask it, sir, from no bad feelings, nor in any captious spirit, and free from the least excitement about the matter; for, sir, I have no personal interest in it, nor has any friend or acquaintance of mine.

Sir, I ask it as a personal favor, and as an act of justice due to me, because, sir, I am prevented from examining the "official records" of the Department, and thereby obtaining information essential to a faithful discharge of my duties as a member of the committee. In conclusion, I again express an earnest desire that the House will excuse me, unless the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] will withdraw his objection, and allow these resolutions to come up and pass, so as to give me an opportunity to examine the "public records," and do my whole duty to my country.

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama. I feel some personal interest in reference to the bill, or the joint resolution of the Senate, about which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] seeks information. From the current of remark which has fallen from the honorable gentleman, I fear that that bill, on its passage through this body, may be prejudiced. I am prepared to meet every objection to the contract which was made by the Postmaster General with the present contractors between Montgomery and Mobile, and I desire that the fullest investigation may be had upon this subject. I hope that the objection to the introduction of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] may be withdrawn, and give the gentleman from Kentucky, who seems opposed to an extension of this contract according to the recommendation of the Postmaster General, the fullest opportunity for investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn upon the appeal made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HARRIS?]

Mr. PHELPS. I do not withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] asks the House to excuse him from further service on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. OLDS. May I be allowed one word?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, and unanimous consent alone.

Mr. OLDS. I think I can explain this matter to the satisfaction of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio have the unanimous consent of the House to make an explanation?

Mr. GREY. I object, unless the resolutions are read.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions have been already read twice.

Mr. OLDS. I was about to suggest that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I think that the whole matter is susceptible of explanation, if the resolutions will be allowed to take that direction.

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is, "Shall the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] be excused from further service on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?"

The question was then taken; and there were—ayes 50, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The number voting in the affirmative is less than a majority of a quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I demand tellers.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I desire to ask the Speaker the question whether debate upon the request to be excused is now in order?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order upon it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. When the question was taken on the demand to be excused, the House was not divided.

The SPEAKER. The House did divide; but before the Chair announced the result, tellers were demanded on the proposition to excuse the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WENTWORTH. But is not the question of excusing debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL, and JONES of Louisiana, were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 37.

So the House agreed to excuse the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] from serving on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, took the floor. The SPEAKER. The Chair must say to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] was recognized by the Chair when he was interrupted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY.] The gentleman from Ohio is therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman from Ohio then give me an opportunity to ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to make a report from a committee, simply for the purpose of reference? I desire to do so now, as I am obliged to leave the city shortly.

Mr. OLDS. Such being the case, I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. STANTON. I then ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report.

Mr. EDGERTON. I must say that the gentleman from Ohio is not authorized to yield the floor; and I feel it my duty to call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. As objection is made, the report cannot be received. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

INCREASE OF POSTAGE.

Mr. OLDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report the bill which I send up to the Clerk's desk. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the reading of the bill. I design to have it read through.

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill further to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851, and an act amendatory thereto, passed August 30, 1852.

The following is the bill in extenso:

A bill further to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851, and the act amendatory thereto, passed August 30, 1852.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after the passage of this act, in lieu of the rates of postage now established by law, there shall be charged the following rates, to wit:

For every single letter in manuscript, or paper of any kind in which information shall be asked for or communicated in writing, or by marks or signs, conveyed in the mail for any distance between places in the United States not exceeding three thousand miles, five cents; and for any distance exceeding three thousand miles, ten cents. For every such letter or paper when conveyed wholly or in part by sea, and to or from a foreign country, for any distance not exceeding three thousand miles, the ocean postage shall be five cents, and for any distance exceeding three thousand miles, such ocean postage shall be ten cents—excepting, however, all cases where such postages have been, or shall be, adjusted at different rates by postal treaty or convention already concluded or hereafter to be made;—and for a double letter there shall be charged double the rate above specified; and for a treble letter, treble those rates; and for a quadruple letter, quadruple those rates; and every letter or parcel not exceeding half an ounce in weight shall be deemed a single letter; and every additional weight of half an ounce, or additional weight of less than half an ounce, shall be charged with an additional single postage; and upon all letters passing through or in the mail of the United States, except such as are from a foreign country, the postages as above specified shall be prepaid; and from and after the first day of January, 1855, such prepayment shall be by stamps; and all drop letters, or letters placed in any post office not for transmission through the mail, but for delivery only, shall be charged with postage at the rate of one cent each; and all letters which shall hereafter be advertised as remaining over, or uncalled for in any post office, shall be charged with one cent each in addition to the regular postage, both to be accounted for as other postages now are.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of an act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes,'" passed August 30, 1852, as is in these words, viz: "And when the postage upon any newspaper or periodical is paid quarterly or yearly in advance, at the office where the said periodical or newspaper is delivered, or is paid yearly or quarterly in advance, at the office where the same is mailed, and evidence of such payment is furnished to the office of delivery in such manner as the Post Office Department shall by general regulations prescribe, one half of said rates only shall be charged," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts which come in conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. OLDS. A week ago last Monday, when we were about acting upon the bill increasing the compensation of postmasters in the United States, I indicated to the House that I was willing to vote for increasing the rates of postage to a sufficient amount to defray the expenses of the Department. Appeals were then made to me to move such a provision as an amendment to that bill. I did not do it then because I thought it better to allow each bill to stand upon its own merits; and I did not wish to have that bill trammelled by connecting it with any other question. But such was the expression of the House at that time, and such were my own pledges to the House, that I felt it to be my duty to bring the matter before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I did bring it before that committee, and they have instructed me to report the bill which has just been read at the Clerk's desk.

At the time to which I have alluded, there was a very general expression in the House that something should be done upon this subject immediately. I therefore propose to take up this bill at this time, and ask the House to put it upon its passage. I want it either to be passed or rejected by the House.

I shall not make any extended argument upon the subject at this time, reserving to myself the right to answer such objections as may be raised in the privilege which I shall have of closing the debate upon the bill. I shall, therefore, at this time, content myself with stating some of the peculiar features of the bill, and in giving the facts and figures which recommend the bill to the favorable consideration of the House.

I commence, Mr. Speaker, by stating to the House that it is necessary that we should do one of two things: either that we should abandon the idea of making the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department, and make it absolutely and unconditionally a charge upon the General Treasury of the country, or to raise the rates of postage to something near the point which will make the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department of the Government.

Now, sir, as long as this Department contains neither the one thing nor the other—as long as it is neither a self-sustaining Department, nor thrown upon the General Treasury, it operates peculiarly hard upon the rural districts of the country. The cities and the eastern States receive no detriment from it, for their postal facilities are fixed, their postal arrangements are perfected and secured to them; but not so with the rural districts. You have at this time a deficit in your post office revenue of more than $2,000,000, in consequence of the reduction of the rates of postage. And when any gentleman, representing a western or a southern constituency, goes to the Postmaster General and asks him to increase the mail facilities in his section of the country, or asks him to establish a new post office in his district, he is met with the answer that there are no funds under the control of the Department for such increased facilities; that the Post Office Department is crippled, and that the Department cannot either establish new post offices or increase the mail facilities until there are funds provided for that purpose.

Now, if you will abandon entirely the idea of making the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department of the Government—if you will do away with your postages altogether, and allow your mail matter to go free through the mail at the expense of the Government, let the Post Office Department be a charge upon the general Treasury, just the same as the War and the Navy Departments are; then the Postmaster General will understand that he can establish new post offices or increase the mail facilities whenever the wants of the community may require it. But if you are to have the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department, then you should raise your postages to a point that will give that Department an amount of revenue sufficient to meet the wants of the service, and to enable the Postmaster General to provide such increased postal facilities as are needed in the rural districts of the country. I wish to make my appeal directly to western and southern gentlemen, for I expect the Representatives from the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore, and perhaps the New England and the Atlantic States to vote against the bill, because the cheap postage of the country results to the benefit of the commercial men of your large commercial cities.

Mr. FULLER. Do not include the State of Maine.

Mr. OLDS. I am glad to accept the delegation from Maine. I hope they will be found voting with me. They may be considered as belonging to the rural districts of the country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that it is not personal to him. It is not personal to any member on this floor; but I can say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania what I said to one of her Representatives the other day, when I spoke of the propriety of passing this bill. He said, "You are right, and I hope that you may succeed in the effort, but it is against the interest of my constituents, and therefore you must not expect my vote for it." I expect that the gentleman, being a Representative from the city of Philadelphia, will vote against the bill because it does not inure to the interest of his constituents; yet I hope that he will have the honesty and candor to admit on this floor that the measure is right, and ought to receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I would be glad if the gentleman would name the member from Pennsylvania to whom he has referred.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope that the gentleman will yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. OLDS. Certainly. I always hear my friend with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. FLORENCE. I want to be convinced that a reduction or increase of the postage will inure to the advantage of anybody, or even to the Treasury of the United States, to make the Department a self-sustaining machine, before I vote to do so. I think, however, that the gentleman expressed my sentiment. I am very much afraid, indeed, that he will not be able to convince me that the bill is right, because I cannot see the difference between a self-sustaining establishment in regard to the Navy, the Army, or the Post Office. Still, I have been listening very attentively to the gentleman, and if he convinces me that his measure is just and right, and that my constituents are likely to be advantaged by it, he knows very well that I shall vote for it. I am very much afraid he cannot do so.

Mr. OLDS. It is an old adage—

"A man convinced against his will,
Is of the same opinion still;"

and I am afraid that it is so with my friend from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

It is not my purpose on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, to say that it is not right to abandon the policy of making the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department. I might, perhaps, agree to the peculiar view of my friend from Pennsylvania, that he ought to abandon the idea of making it a self-sustaining one, and to throw it, as you do the Army and Navy, on the Treasury of the United States. It is not my purpose either to say that it should not be a self-sustaining Department of the Government; but I do say that you should do either the one thing or the other, for as long as you pretend to receive a revenue from the mails of the United States sufficient to support the mail facilities of the country, just so long will the Postmaster General feel himself compelled, from the necessity of the case, to deny mail facilities in the sparsely settled districts of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is an easy matter for us to ascertain what is the revenue point for postages; and let me say, before I proceed to that point, that the argument constantly used on this floor and elsewhere, that in Great Britain there is cheap postage, and the Post Office Department not only sustains itself, but affords a revenue to the country, is not applicable to this matter, or, if applicable, the same rate of postage cannot obtain here that does there, and still have the Post Office a self-sustaining Department of the Government.

Look, if you please, sir, at the Island of Great Britain, with a territory no larger than the State of New York, she has a population larger than the whole United States. It does not cost her more to transport the mails throughout the whole Island, than it costs the United States to transport our mails through the State of New York alone. And yet the revenue derived by Great Britain from her Post Office Department, is more than equal of the revenue of the Post Office Department of the United States. You cannot, therefore, expect that the same rates of postage can obtain here as in Great Britain, and our Post Office Department be a self-sustaining one. The penny postage in Great Britain, which is a two cent postage, is fully as adequate to sustain the post office department of that country, as a five cent postage is to sustain the Post Office Department of this country, and other things being equal, a five cent postage in this country is as moderate and just, as is a two cent postage in the Island of Great Britain.

Now, sir, what is the revenue point for postages? It is easily ascertained. It will be recollected that up to the commencement of the year 1846, the maximum rate of postage on letters was twenty-five cents; and what was the revenue derived under that rate of postage? In 1841 the revenue of the Post Office Department was $4,407,000; in 1842 it was $4,546,000; in 1843 it was $4,229,000; in 1844 it was $4,237,000; in 1845 it was $4,289,000. Thus for the five years preceding the reduction of postage from the maximum rate of twenty-five cents, the revenue of the Department averaged $4,250,000. In 1845, you reduced the postages to five and ten cents; and what was the revenue of the Department from that time until the taking effect of the law of 1851, by which you reduced the postages to three and five cents? In 1846 it was $3,388,000, being a reduction for the first year of nearly three quarters of a million of dollars; in 1847 it was $4,161,000, coming up to within less than a quarter of a million of dollars of the maximum receipts under the twenty-five cents postage; in 1848 it was $4,705,000, being an increase at five and ten cents on the highest receipts under the twenty-five cent postages; in 1850 it was $5,499,000; in 1851, being the last year of the five and ten cent postages, it was $6,410,000, being an increase of nearly two millions of dollars over the maximum receipts under the twenty-five cent postages.

Mr. SKELTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, if he will not consent to allow this bill to be postponed to a day certain. It is a bill of too much importance to be acted on hastily. I am satisfied that we need some reform in the Post Office Department, and I should like to have an opportunity of presenting amendments to this bill.

Mr. OLDS. When I have concluded my remarks, I shall have no objection to the postponement of the bill to a day certain.

Mr. SKELTON. Then by all means let it be postponed.

Mr. OLDS. Before the floor is taken from me to move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table, I desire the Clerk to enter the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAGE. This is a very important bill which I desire to have printed.

Mr. OLDS. When a motion is made to postpone to a day certain, a motion to print will then be in order.

The SPEAKER. The motion to print will not now be in order.

Mr. OLDS. At the conclusion of my remarks, I will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SAGE,] to move to postpone the bill to a day certain, and to print. I am sure that every gentleman will feel an anxiety to print this bill.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I have been for some time a party to these postponements to a day certain; but so far, when a bill has come up on the day of postponement, it has been postponed to still another day. When we postpone a bill to a day certain, I desire it to come up on that day, when reached.

Mr. OLDS. I will say, that the bill can be printed in the Globe to-morrow morning, so as to give members an opportunity of examining it, without postponing it to a day certain.

I have shown what the revenues of the Post Office Department were under the reduction of postage that took place in consequence of the act of 1845. For the fiscal years 1852, 1853, we were under the operation of the law that was passed on the 3d of March, 1851, by which postage was reduced to three cents for prepaid, and five cents for unpaid letters.

Let me call the attention of the House to the revenues of the Department under this condition of things. In 1852 the revenues were $5,184,000—being a reduction of more than one and a quarter million of dollars. If the increase of letters had been commensurate with the reduction of postage, there should have been no loss of this million and a quarter of dollars—at all events the second year should have come up to the former revenue. But in 1853 the revenue was only $5,240,724, being an increase of less than $50,000 over the previous year, not more than equal to the increased business of the country over that of the previous year. I use this as an argument to show that your rates of three and five cents have reduced the postage of the country below the revenue point, and that the five and ten cent rates is the true revenue point as shown from these figures. If you desire, then, to make the Post Office Department a self-sustaining Department of the Government, you have facts and figures before you so that you cannot err in coming to the true revenue point.

I will now point out the changes which the committee propose to make in the postages of the country. Your postage upon letters now, anywhere under three thousand miles, is three cents where prepaid, and five cents where unpaid. We propose to make the rate of postage, prepaid, for any distance under three thousand miles, just what it is now upon unpaid letters. It is not an increase of postage upon unpaid letters, but it is to make the rate five cents, what it is now upon unpaid letters, and require prepayment. Some gentlemen ask me why we require the postage to be prepaid in stamps? The reason why we require this postage to be prepaid in stamps instead of money is, that the finance bureau of the Department, under this arrangement, will have a complete check upon the postmasters of the country. What checks and balances have you now? Nothing in the world but your post-bills. These go from the small post offices in the country to the distributing post offices, and from thence to the General Post Office. Now, I venture the assertion, that if you take the whole clerical force in the whole Post Office Department, and, in addition, if you take every person employed under the control of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, I venture the assertion that they cannot balance the accounts, by means of these post-bills, between one single postmaster of the country and the Department, under the present system.

Why, sir, there are no checks at all now. The Postmaster General himself acknowledges the fact in his report made to us at the commencement of this Congress. But the moment that the law requires the postage on letters to be prepaid by stamps, then you have a perfect check on every postmaster in the country. It would be the most perfect system of checks and balances that could possibly be adopted.

I may be told that it would be a great inconvenience to the general public, and that it cannot be expected that gentlemen are to be always prepared with postage stamps. Why, sir, it is not requisite that they should be always provided with postage stamps. If the gentleman from Maine, who sets by me, for instance, has no postage stamp to prepay his letter with, he has five cents to pay for one. He goes to the postmaster of his town, hands to him the letter and the five cents, and the postmaster affixes the stamp. Then when this system is enforced, there is a sufficient check between the country postmasters and the Post Office Department. The bill provides that the prepayment of letters is not to take effect until the first of January next, for the purpose of enabling the Postmaster General to provide for the issue of a new set of stamps, and to put them into the hands of deputy postmasters. Whether the postage remain at three cents, or be fixed at five cents, it is important to require prepayment, and that the prepayment be in stamps.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the next change proposed in this bill is in regard to ocean postage. Your committee have felt constrained to take that subject into their consideration. They have been instructed to do so by the resolutions of this House, and by resolutions referred to them from the different State Legislatures. And your committee saw no good reason why you should charge twenty cents for the transportation of a letter three thousand miles by water, and only five cents for the transportation of a letter three thousand miles by land. Your committee could see no good reason why you should charge anything more for the transportation of a letter from New York to Liverpool, a distance of three thousand miles, than you should for the transportation of a letter from Boston to Mobile, or to New Orleans, or to Houston, Texas, or to the Territory of Minnesota. Does it not cost Government just as much to transport a letter by land as it does to transport it by water? If therefore you charge twenty cents for the one, there is no good reason why you should not make a like charge for the other. We propose therefore to reduce the ocean postage to just the same as the cost by land. For instance, we propose that when the letters are conveyed three thousand miles, whether by land or water, the postage shall be five cents, and where the distance is greater than three thousand miles, it shall be ten cents. Where you have an established postage agreed upon, by convention or treaty, between this and a foreign country, we do not propose to disturb such arrangement; and where such convention or treaty may hereafter become necessary, we propose that the rates may be changed by such convention or treaty stipulation. But where you have no postal regulations or convention rate of postage, we propose that the postage shall be the same on the ocean as the postage on the land; and I hope I shall receive the support of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] and the support of the gentlemen who represent Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and New Jersey, who are clamorous for cheap ocean postage. I say, I hope I shall receive their support for thus much of the bill. As they are desirous and willing to reduce the ocean postage to the specific sum of five cents, I hope they will at the same time assist in raising the postage upon land transportation up to the same sum, knowing that it costs just as much to transport a letter by land as it does upon the ocean.

Allow me for a few moments to call your attention to the change which the committee recommend in relation to the postage on printed matter. The present rates are so unjust, that the Postmaster General has called the special attention of the committee to the subject. I will ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I have marked in his communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

"I deem it my duty to use the present occasion to bring to your notice the fact that the compensation of the postmasters at the small offices was considerably reduced by the operation of that provision of the 'Act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage,' &c., approved August 30, 1852, which declares that, 'When the postage upon any newspaper or periodical is paid quarterly or yearly in advance at the office where the said periodical or newspaper is delivered, or is paid yearly or quarterly in advance at the office where the same is mailed, and evidence of such payment is furnished to the office of delivery in such manner as the Post Office Department shall, by general regulations, prescribe, one half said rates only shall be charged.' This discount of fifty per cent. allowed for prepayment, inures chiefly to the benefit of the postmasters in the large towns and cities, where the prepayment is commonly made, and the country postmasters have to deliver the papers and periodicals without any compensation."

Mr. OLDS. It will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that when the act of the 30th of August, 1852, was under consideration, in which act the rate of postage upon newspapers and periodicals was modified, an effort was made, and successfully, in this House, to insert an amendment therein, similar to that referred to by the Postmaster General. It was afterwards inserted in the bill by the Senate. It was maintained in this House, that that amendment would accrue to the benefit of publishers of newspapers and periodicals in the large cities, and operate adversely to the interest of the country newspaper press. The bill went into the Senate, was amended there, and came back to this House near the close of the session, and we were obliged to take it as it was, with the amendment, or lose all the good which was contained in the other provisions of the bill. The House agreed to the amendment under those circumstances, and it became a law.

The Postmaster General says it works great injustice to the country post offices, and I call the attention of members of this House, who represent rural districts, to the fact that it does great injustice to the press, the newspapers of their districts.

And here, again, I shall meet with opposition from gentlemen who represent the city press. They will oppose this change for the reason expressed by my worthy friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] and they, like him, will vote against it because it is a proposition which will not advance the interest of their immediate constituents. Inasmuch as it operates unequally and unjustly, and is wrong in itself, I propose that it shall be repealed.

But what is the justice of this reduction? What do you now charge for the transportation of periodicals through the mails? You charge for their transportation anywhere within the United States, even to California, one cent for the first three ounces, and one cent for each additional ounce. So it will be in this bill, if you repeal the clause to which I refer—which clause provides for a deduction of fifty per cent. prepayment. But as the law now stands, you receive only half of a cent for carrying three ounces of periodicals to California, and half a cent for each additional ounce. Do gentlemen know what the transportation cost the Government? The cost of transporting mail matter across the Isthmus alone is twenty-four cents per pound—double the amount which the Government receives for the whole postage upon periodicals going to the Pacific coast. Is it not really worth a cent an ounce to carry such matter from here to California? And the same in regard to newspapers. Take, for example, the Courier and Enquirer, of New York, which weighs between two and a half and three ounces, and if this amendment, which is proposed by the Post Office Committee, is adopted, you will carry that paper from New York to New Orleans, to Texas, and to San Francisco, for one cent; whereas, under the present rate, the Government receives only half a cent, and one half of that goes either to the postmaster at New York or New Orleans. Is one cent too much? Is it more than it costs the Government, considering that one half goes to the postmaster for delivery? Is half a cent per ounce too much to meet the expenses of transportation? Can you ask the Government to do it for less? Why, then, is it that you have inserted this provision? Why, sir, under this provision, the publishers of papers in New York and Philadelphia can go with their newspapers and periodicals, to the little town in which I live at home, and get as many subscribers as can be obtained for the paper published in that town. Its operation is against the presses in the rural districts of the country, and every gentleman representing one of the rural districts of the country is bound, in justice to his constituents, to vote for striking the provision out of the law which makes a reduction of fifty per cent. upon periodicals when they are paid in advance. If you can afford to carry these periodicals for half a cent for the first three ounces, and a half a cent for each additional ounce, it would be much better to make that provision in the first place, and not make a law that the rate shall be one cent for the first three ounces, and one cent for every additional ounce, and then make a further provision that there shall be a reduction of fifty per cent. in case of prepayment.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to do any injustice to the city presses. I am willing to do justice to the eastern States, and to the thickly settled portions of the country; but when I do justice to them, I also desire to do justice to the other parts of the country. But I repeat, that there is no good reason why you should fix the rate of postage upon the first three ounces at one cent, and then provide for a reduction of fifty per cent., and I hope that provision of the existing law will be stricken out.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the provisions of the bill; and they are all the changes it proposes to make in the existing law. The effect of its passage will be to increase the revenue of the Post Office Department at least $2,500,000, as I can show from estimates which I have in my possession. Pass this bill into a law, and provide that five cents shall be paid upon letters sent not more than three thousand miles, and ten cents for letters sent over that distance, and then when the gentleman from Georgia, or the gentleman from Alabama, or the gentleman from Wisconsin, go to the Postmaster General to get him to establish some new post office, or to ask him to increase the mail service upon some route in his district, he will not be met with the plea that there is no money in the treasury of the Department out of which the expenses of these increased facilities can be paid.

Now, in conclusion, let me say to those gentlemen representing the eastern States, that their railroads and their ocean steamers are swallowing up all the revenues of the Post Office Department, and that it is but justice to them to go for some provision which will give increased mail facilities to the rural districts of the country.

This is all I propose to say in relation to this bill in its present stage. When the debate upon it shall have been closed, I shall avail myself of my right to reply to such objections as may have been raised against it.

Mr. MEACHAM. I wish simply to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: Whether, during the last ten months preceding the month of April, there has not been an increase of twelve hundred post offices in the country, and whether by the first of June next there will not be an increase of two thousand? If that be the case—if we can increase two thousand each year, it appears to me that we are not so poor as the gentleman would make out.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman a question. Is not the increase of which he speaks under a provision of the law which expressly provides that the mail facilities shall not be diminished in consequence of the reduction of the postage and the diminution of the revenue? And is not the deficiency of means supplied by a withdrawal of the money from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. OLDS. The act of the 3d March, 1851, in the sixth section, contains a provision that the compensation of postmasters shall not be reduced in consequence of the reduction which it makes in the postage of the country. The seventh section provides that the Postmaster General shall not do away with any post office or post route; that he shall give the same increase of mail facilities as though the act had not passed. Now, I will give the increase of postmasters for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Vermont.

On the 30th of June, 1850, it was 18,417; on the 30th of June, 1851, it was 19,706; on the 30th of June, 1852, it was 20,009; on the 30th of June, 1853, it was 22,320.

And it will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that the last Congress established nearly two thousand new post routes in the country, all of which called for new offices and all of which would have had service and offices in accordance with the provision of the seventh section of the law of the 3d of March, 1851, had it not been for the fact that the Postmaster General did not wish to cripple the revenues of his office by doing so. Now there are constant complaints by gentlemen representing the southern and western districts, that they cannot get their increased mail facilities. They cannot get their increase of post offices, because they are met by the Postmaster General with the declaration that the revenues of the Department are crippled.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman consider that a sufficient excuse on the part of the Postmaster General for denying these increased mail facilities?

Mr. OLDS. I answered that when I said that if you could entirely abandon the idea of making the Post Office Department a self-sustaining one, and make it a charge on the Treasury, just as you do your Army and Navy, then no Postmaster General would feel himself crippled. But until you do that, you, Mr. Speaker, and the gentleman from Illinois, will find that it will be a cry raised on the stump, as well as here, against the Postmaster General, that the expenditures of the Department are $2,500,000 over and above the receipts. He will feel himself bound to keep the expenditures down in consequence of this cry being constantly made against him.

Mr. CHANDLER obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. COBB, who said: If the gentleman will allow me, as there are but a few minutes before the expiration of the morning hour, I will move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania consents, I will submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was my desire to reply to some remarks of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but as it is likely that the subject is to come up again, I will yield to what appears to be the inclination of gentlemen. But before I take my seat, I desire to express the hope that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee] may be allowed to report one or two bills which are absolutely necessary. I now take my seat, considering that I shall be entitled to the floor when the subject again comes up.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported "a bill to modify the judicial system of the United States;" which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. S. said: My object in reporting that bill is to have it printed in order that the House may see and understand it. It is a bill of great importance, and may require some attention. I propose to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to my colleague that the better way would be to let it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

Mr. STANTON. I think it would be better to keep it pending during the morning hour.

Mr. JONES. A bill of this importance, and that requires action, can certainly be taken up at almost any time.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SAGE. I move that the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be made the special order for this day week, and be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

Mr. SAGE. Would a motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill be in order?

The SPEAKER. A motion to postpone to a day certain would be in order.

Mr. PHELPS. Is there not a motion pending to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. OLDS. I hope, if the consideration of the bill is postponed at all, it will be put off for four weeks, as I am under the necessity of going home. I will consent to a motion to postpone it for four weeks.

Mr. SAGE. Then I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed for four weeks, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor upon this subject.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will probably yield the floor to allow the bill to be postponed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair mentions the fact because the floor cannot be taken from the gentleman from Pennsylvania for any such purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield the floor to enable the motion to postpone to be made.

Mr. SAGE. I then move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till this day four weeks, and that it be printed.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. SAGE. I will do so, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. LETCHER. I will renew it.

Mr. SAGE. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the consideration of the bill will not be postponed, but that it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It seems to me that we have swapped the devil for a witch. [Laughter.] We have at last got rid of the Committee on Public Lands, and now the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are trying to put all their bills upon their passage. I hope we shall have no more postponements. I now renew the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SAGE. On that motion I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone is not debatable, and, in fact, the previous question would cut off that motion.

Mr. SAGE. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The question was then taken on Mr. SAGE's motion, (as renewed by Mr. LETCHER;) and it was agreed to.

GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. I believe that it is the general disposition of the House to go on with and pass the graduation bill; and I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, and allow me to move to postpone the consideration of the special order for one hour.

Mr. COBB. Oh, no; we can get through with the bill in thirty minutes. No one is disposed to speak on the subject for more than five or ten minutes.

Mr. UPHAM. Is it in order for me to present a report from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order until the motion of the gentleman from Alabama has been disposed of.

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's motion; and it was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FULLER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill (No. 1) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, and to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands."

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to amend the seventh section by striking out "one dollar" and inserting "sixty-two and a half cents" in lieu thereof.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw that amendment.

Mr. LILLY. I desire to offer an amendment at the end of the seventh section.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending, proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], to strike out the words "one dollar" and insert in lieu thereof "ninety cents."

Mr. BISSELL. I will withdraw that amendment, if there be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then recurs upon the motion to strike out the remainder of the seventh section.

Mr. LILLY. I propose to add at the end of the seventh section, the following proviso:

Nor to any public lands lying within fifteen miles of any railroad, which has been or hereafter may be constructed, either in whole or in part, by donations of public lands by Congress.

The proviso to this section reads as follows:

"Provided, This section shall not be so construed as to extend to lands reserved to the United States, in acts granting land to States for railroad or other internal improvements, or to mineral lands held at over $1 25 per acre."

I understand gentlemen who are in favor of these railroad grants to make an argument of this kind: That the alternate sections of land reserved are worth double the price now that they were before the reservations were made, and that those lands which were in market at $1 25 per acre, previous to the passage of these railroad bills, are now worth $2 50 per acre. And not only so, but gentlemen have said that lands fifteen or twenty miles remote from these railroads, are greatly enhanced in value, and brought into market. The proviso which I have offered reserves lands for fifteen miles from the operation of this section—thus securing the benefit which these gentlemen say will accrue to the United States. According to the provisions of the bill as it now stands, those lands which are seven miles, or just without the alternate sections, if they have been in market for thirty years, will be sold for twelve and a half cents per acre. The object I have in view in the proviso I have offered is, that the United States shall have the full benefit of any improvement in the price of lands, whether they are within six miles of the reserved sections or not. I hope gentlemen who are in favor of these railroad bills, will have no objection to the adoption of the proviso I have offered. It is designed by the proviso, that the United States shall have the benefit of any increase in the price of the lands within fifteen miles of the railroads which may be constructed by grants of public lands.

Mr. COBB. I do not want to occupy the time of the committee for more than two or three minutes on this amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, as my object is to get this bill out of the way of the other business waiting for action. If the gentleman from New Jersey will examine

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

NEW SERIES...No. 58.

the bill, he will find that there is a proviso which renders his amendment in part unnecessary. It provides to except the lands reserved to the United States, or those given to the States for railroad or other purposes, for internal improvements, or the mineral lands held at $1 25 per acre.

Mr. LILLY. I ask the gentleman how far that proviso extends?

Mr. COBB. Just as far as the lands extend. I shall make no formal speech now in reply to the gentleman's argument; but I hope his amendment will not pass, but that the committee will go on with the bill. I have been preparing to make a speech on this subject, which I would like to deliver; but for the sake of progressing with the business in the House, I am willing to forego the opportunity of doing so, and will wait till I get home, when I will give it to my constituency. [Laughter.] I shall retain that speech; it is a good one. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey will not be adopted.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I propose to offer the following amendment.

In the seventeenth line of the seventh section, strike out the words "subject to sale at twelve and a half cents per acre," and insert "shall be ceded to the States in which they lie."

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that there is no question which so much divides the Democratic party of this country, as this public land question. So long as the Congress of the United States shall have the control of the public lands, so long will the Democratic party not be a unit in this country. It has been the policy of one of the most distinguished statesmen belonging to that party to which we belong—and a gentleman whose views were certainly more Democratic, at least, I think so, than any of the statesmen who have lived under the Constitution of the United States—I mean Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina. It was his policy, a cherished policy of his life, to get rid of the question of the public lands, by ceding them to the States in which they lie, under some condition or other.

It strikes me that the amendment which I propose is one which the gentlemen of the southern States, at least, who cherish the memory and principles of Mr. Calhoun, cannot object to. After lands have been in market for some twenty-five years, and when they cease to be worth twenty-five cents per acre, it seems to me that it would be the true policy of the Government of the United States to yield them to the States in which they lie. That would be, I say, the true policy of the Government, not only upon principle but as a matter of economy. If lands are not worth more than twelve and a half cents per acre, why, it would cost more to keep up your Land Office, and to sell them, than the revenue which would be produced by the sale of them.

True, Mr. Chairman, it would take a long time—thirty years—to get rid of this public land question in Congress, under the proposition which I have submitted. But Congress would get rid of it in that time, and it would be far better that this should be done, rather than that the question should continue to divide the Democratic party of this country.

Mr. DISNEY. The propositions that have been made to amend the original bill are, in my opinion, all of them bad, but the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JONES,] as I understand it, is infinitely worse.

This is not the occasion, but I shall avail myself of an early opportunity to address the House at length in regard to our policy in reference to the public domain. But let me say here in general terms, that the House is generally laboring under a grievous error in regard to the true history of the action of Congress in relation to the public domain.

This bill as it stands ought to be entitled—for such will be its inevitable effect—"A bill to retard the settlement of the frontiers of the country," because, as I remarked yesterday, the demand for the public domain is of necessity and of itself limited in amount. So if you hold out inducements to settle the older of the land States of the Union, by cheapening the price of the land therein, you prevent emigration to the newer parts of the country. But if the present policy of the country is insisted on, and adhered to, you will people the wilderness, and cause to mingle in a few years, the population of the Pacific with that of the Atlantic coast. If you resist that progress and change the present land policy, and depart from the principle which has been heretofore pursued, you will change the entire system of things, and bring back the Government to the policy of disposing of the lands of the older States of the Union first—I repeat it, you will arrest the settlement of the newer portions of the public domain.

Now, I heard a gentleman yesterday illustrating the position of the Government in regard to the public lands, by comparing it to the case of property held by the churches of the middle ages in England. Gentlemen who talk thus are too well informed seriously to insist upon an illustration or parallel of that sort. That was a case where the ecclesiastical power of the country overshadowed and pressed down the yeomanry of the country.

Complaints were made of the same sort, and from the same quarter, of the grasping power of the General Government in regard to the public domain. Is that true? Do the facts sustain the charge? Has not the Government, on the contrary, been liberal in the extreme in this respect? Look at your preemption laws. Why, sir, but the other day this House passed a bill absolutely making a free and naked gift of land to actual settlers upon the public domain. And yet gentlemen, who are in favor of this bill, stand up here and talk about the overbearing power and the grasping disposition of this Government in regard to the public lands.

Sir, this question connected with the disposition of the public domain is, as I understand it, entirely misunderstood by very many gentlemen upon this floor. Congress has not heretofore voted away, as donations and as naked gifts, large portions of the public domain; but, as I shall undertake to show, and shall show conclusively from the records of the country, the amount thus voted away is exceedingly limited—not exceeding fifty thousand acres, instead of the hundreds of millions of acres, as asserted by a gentleman the other day. All these things I shall notice in proper time.

I now come back to this bill. Its effect will be to retard the settlement of the frontier of our country. It will prevent the extension of those settlements, and limit them to those portions of the public domain which lie within the older land States of the Union. That policy, in my judgment, is unwise, and ought not to be sustained by this House. I showed yesterday, and showed conclusively, that in 1828, according to a report from the General Land Office, fifty millions of acres of the public land remained unsold, which had been in market for a long period of time; and yet, in 1840—only twelve years subsequent to the date of that statement—nineteen million two hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and forty-one of these same fifty millions—barely exceeding one third of the quantity—had been sold for a sum exceeding the amount estimated as the value of the whole in 1828.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. JONES, of Louisiana; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SKELTON. I move to amend in the tenth line by striking out the word "twenty," and inserting the word "twenty-five," so that the clause may read:

"And all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty-five years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at fifty cents per acre."

Mr. Chairman, the bill which we have now under consideration, I believe to be one of great importance to the country. The principle involved in it is, to my mind, the same as that involved in the bill called the homestead bill. The main object of both of these bills is to secure, as rapidly as possible, the settlement and cultivation of the public lands. This is an object which will be conceded by every American citizen as highly desirable to attain; and I am astonished to find that many of the Representatives from the new States—from the States in which these lands are located—should object to the passage of this bill.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, who has just taken his seat, [Mr. DISNEY,] says the effect of the passage of this bill will be to prevent the settlement upon the public lands which have come into market at a later period upon the remote frontiers of the country. That will be its effect to some extent, it is true; but I ask gentlemen representing the States in which the lands to which this bill principally applies, whether it is not for the interest of their constituents that these lands should be settled as rapidly as possible? Is it not for their interest that these lands, which are now an uncultivated wilderness, should become peopled by hardy and industrious settlers?

Sir, the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, to my mind, has no weight at all. The object of the Government, in disposing of its public lands, should be to secure their speedy settlement, whether it be of lands which have been in the market a long or a short time. This bill will, in my opinion, promote that object; because it will secure the settlement and cultivation of the waste lands of the country. Calculate for a moment what would be the effect of cultivating these lands which have been in the market twenty or thirty years. Let them be put under cultivation, and how many crops would it take to pay the price for them at $1 25 per acre? How many years would it require? Why, sir, every crop would pay ten times over the amount the General Government will get for them; and if, in the last twenty years, while these lands have been lying an uncultivated waste, they had been under cultivation, the benefit which would have resulted therefrom is incalculable; it is a hundred times over the value of the lands to the Government. Hence it should be the object of every man to secure the cultivation and settlement of these lands as rapidly as possible.

But the gentleman tells us that by this bill you will not get the lands taken up as rapidly as would otherwise be the case; that the lands upon your frontiers will not be taken. Now, sir, there are many persons in the older States who have not the means of taking themselves and families to the frontier settlements, who would very gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of settling upon some of these lands, if the price were reduced within their means to purchase.

But again, the effect of this bill will be to attract and draw off many who otherwise would go to your cities for homes. It holds out inducements to them to go into your western States, and cultivate the soil. Thus many would be drawn from the purities of vice and corruption in your cities, and become hardy and industrious citizens of the western States.

If I could satisfy myself that the Senate would pass the homestead bill, I should prefer that to this. But the fears which I entertain in reference to the fate of that bill, forces me to support this as the next best proposition to secure the settlement of the public lands of the country. I repeat, sir, that the object of this Government in disposing of the public lands should not be to secure as much revenue from them as possible; it should be to settle them as speedily as possible. These lands should be cultivated. We want the products of the soil, and we want men to produce them—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WADE. It seems to me that the views which have been taken in reference to this bill, are entirely erroneous. I do not know what quantity of land under it will be subject to entry at twelve and a half cents; or what quantity at twenty-five cents per acre; but I am confident as to what will be the result in regard to that which may remain subject to entry at those prices. It will ultimately fall into the hands of speculators instead of those of poor settlers.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] says that it will draw the poor from the cities to settle on these lands. Capitalists will purchase these lands at twelve and a half cents per acre.

Mr. COBB. I would call the gentleman's attention to the latter clause of the bill, which restricts the entry of any one individual to three hundred and twenty acres.

Mr. WADE. Then I am satisfied with the bill, though dissatisfied with the reasons which have been given for it.

* The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment, it was put, and the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill. Mr. COBB. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "until," in the eighth section, the words, "within thirty days preceding." If that amendment be adopted, I shall move to strike out the words "twelve months," and in lieu thereof insert the words "eleven months," so that the section would read as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That upon every reduction in price, under the provisions of this act, the occupant and settler upon the lands shall have the right of preemption at such graduated price, upon the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations, upon which the public lands of the United States are now subject to the right of preemption, until within thirty days preceding the next graduation or reduction shall take place; and if not so purchased, shall again be subject to right of preemption for eleven months as before, and so on from time to time, as reductions take place: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any right which has or may accrue by virtue of any act granting preemption to actual settlers upon public lands.

It will be perceived that the amendment is an important one. If the settler does not come in and enter the land within thirty days of the next graduation, we open the land to others. We do not ask for settlers perpetual preemption. We do not ask that settlers shall hold their land over twelve months, other twelve months again, and so on, until he can get it for twelve and a half cents. My amendment, on the failure of the settler to enter within thirty days of the next graduation, allows somebody else to come in and enter it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. COBB. To make the section correspond with the amendment just adopted, I now move to strike out the words "twelve months," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "eleven months."

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill. Mr. COBB. I move to strike from the ninth section the words "under the provisions of the eighth and ninth sections of this act." They are rendered unnecessary by previous amendment.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN. Is it in order to move to strike out the entire section?

The CHAIRMAN. Not while amendments are pending for perfecting the section.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Chairman, nobody seems to be much interested in the progress of this measure; at least it seems to be moving along in this committee in a very desultory manner, and so that no one can tell whether it has more friends or enemies among us.

I shall, when I have spoken briefly in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB], take the first proper opportunity to move that the committee do rise and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass. It seems to me that such a motion is the only one which will develop the sentiments of the committee in reference to the bill.

What possible use can there be in spending further time upon this bill? What is to be gained by it? Is it for the benefit of the poor and laboring men of the country that this legislation is needed, as we are told it is, by gentlemen upon the other side of the House? Why, sir, we have already passed and sent to the Senate a bill giving the poor man (nay, and the rich too) about as much land as they can occupy, if they will only go and settle upon it, without the payment of a single cent.

Is this legislation then, for the benefit of the rich man? No, sir; for the ninth section of this bill limits the entry of any one man under it (rich or poor) to three hundred and twenty acres. Then, sir, I ask for whom are we legislating in this bill?

It seems to be agreed, on all sides, that we shall keep the public lands out of the hands of speculators. Why then, sir, as this bill confines its provisions to actual settlers, and in small quantities, why, I ask, shall we foolishly provide that the settler may take at twenty-five cents, fifty cents, seventy-five cents, one dollar, or one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, as the case may be, when, by the provisions of the homestead bill, we give him the privilege of taking the same lands for nothing? Does any one doubt under which bill the settler will make his entry?

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] avers that he will vote for this bill, because he entertains doubts of the passage of the homestead bill in the Senate, declaring that he prefers that bill to this, and will vote for this only, because this can be made available to the country, if that fails elsewhere. Now, sir, I voted against that bill; I voted against it very reluctantly. I was very nearly poised in my judgment upon the subject of its merits. I am quite willing to see that bill become a law. And let me say to the gentleman from New Jersey, that the best way to secure the passage of that bill in the Senate, is to offer them no alternative whatever; but let them know we stand firm upon our judgment in reference to that measure.

There is a bill now on the Speaker's table, sir, which has been postponed to a day certain, and which day will soon arrive, that will open up all the pending questions in reference to the public lands. I refer to the bill of my colleague, [Mr. BENNETT], and which bill is known as "Bennett's bill." That bill, sir, and the substitutes and amendments offered to it by the Speaker, and by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS], cover the whole ground. On the discussion of the questions there presented, this question of the graduation of price of the public lands most naturally belongs. In my opinion, sir, that is the time when it should be met and settled.

We ask now, sir, only $1.25 per acre for the public lands. That, I submit, is reasonably cheap—cheap enough. More especially is it cheap enough when any man who is unwilling to give it can, under the homestead bill, take his land for nothing. Yes, sir, without paying a single cent.

Why, sir, it costs me—it costs all of us—two acres of land each a day, rated at the present prices, for our meals and lodging whilst we are legislating here for the country. Is it not true, sir, either that we are paying high prices, or the price of land is very low at the present minimum? I submit to the committee, sir, we had better go back into the House with this bill at once, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. COBB. What amendment does the gentleman from New York propose? I want to oppose it, and I think I can answer what the gentleman has said very satisfactorily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has been speaking in opposition to the pending amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. HAVEN. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. COBB. Before that motion is entertained, I wish to propose one more amendment to the bill;—to strike out the word "perjury" at the end of the third section.

I am sorry to find my worthy and talented friend from New York [Mr. HAVEN] opposing a measure which, I think, commends itself to every rational mind. I can only excuse him upon this ground, for I know that his heart is right—

Mr. LETCHER. Is the motion of the gentleman from New York debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from New York would not be in order as long as gentlemen have amendments to offer.

Mr. COBB. I am satisfied that if the gentleman from New York had investigated the bearings of this question, he would have come to the conclusion, that the bill now under consideration does not interfere with the homestead bill in the least. There are thousands of individuals who have one hundred and sixty acres of land now who do not intend to avail themselves of the benefit of the homestead bill, provided you will allow them, under the provisions of this bill, to enter lands adjoining theirs at their intrinsic value. By the passage of this bill much will be saved to the Government; for there are a great many individuals who would pay for the land if you were to allow them to do so at their proper valuation, who otherwise will take up one hundred and sixty acres under the homestead bill, and settle there five years for the purpose of securing it. I contend that this bill has for its object not only the benefit of the poor man, but the interest of the General Government, in a revenue point of view. If the Government were to sell the lands at a fair price, it would receive, in a very few years, an amount equal to what she has received for many years past, and the poor men of the country would have land for cultivation, and, thereby, means of subsistence. I will say to the friends of the homestead bill, that there is no better friend of that bill in this House than myself; and I am the last man to interpose any obstacle in its way. I ask gentlemen not to get up a scare-crow, in order to drive the friends of the homestead policy from the support of a measure of so much importance as the one now under consideration. I am sorry to find my colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS], who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, taking the position he has, with regard to this question. I am sorry to find him treading upon the ashes of the illustrious Jackson, Polk, and others, who have recommended this policy.

I will send up to the reporter's desk the following statement from the Department of the Interior, containing some important facts bearing upon this question, which I desire to be incorporated with my remarks:

Nothing retards the growth and prosperity of the country more, nor inflicts greater injury upon the resident, than the possession, by individuals or companies, of extensive uncultivated tracts of the public lands. To correct this evil, facilities should be liberally extended to the actual settler, and withheld from the mere speculator.

During the last fiscal year 9,819,411 acres have been surveyed, and 10,363,891 acres brought into market. In the same period there were—

It may be several years before the land warrants and scrip will be exhausted, and, until then, the amount of land sold for cash will be comparatively small.

Its purchase was effected at the rate of 14.41 cents per acre, amounting to..... $67,999,700

To this should be added the Indian reservations, which enter into the original cost, amounting to 3,409,725 acres, which, valued at $1.25 per acre, would make..... 4,250,806

Up to 30th June, 1853, 334,256,810 acres had been sold, at an expense of 2.07 cents per acre, making..... 6,919,116

And 184,657,135 acres sold at an additional expense for selling, at 5.32 cents per acre, making..... 9,824,291

The entire cost (including surveying and selling) being..... $88,994,013

The whole amount accruing from sales up to 30th June, 1853, was $142,283,478; being $53,289,465 more than the cost of the whole, thus far, inclusive of survey and sale.

Of the surveyed lands there have been granted—
 For educational purposes..... 11,199,973 acres.
 For military boundaries..... 24,641,980 "
 And for internal improvements..... 16,607,013 "

Making 52,748,966 "

There yet remain of the surveyed lands 96,940,709 acres, worth (after deducting the cost of selling yet to be borne).....$116,918,641
 And 137,635,629 acres, worth (after deducting the expense of surveying and selling)..... 161,873,263

Making 277,891,904

To which add the net profits received for lands actually sold..... 53,289,465

And we find that, while the purchase, survey, and sale of the public lands will, in the end, have cost $88,994,013, the net amount which will have been realized therefor is the enormous sum of.....$331,181,369

The CHAIRMAN. The pending motion is to strike out the word "perjury."

Mr. BISSELL. I object to striking out the word "perjury," because I think the bill will be less perfect if that word is omitted. I should be very sorry to see anything done which would weaken the prospect for the success of this bill.
 There has been scarcely a bill before the House conceived, as I believe, in better policy than the one now under consideration. I look upon it as a sequel, and a very appropriate one, to the homestead bill. What was the argument adduced in support of that bill? It was that the Government itself derived an indirect profit from having the public lands brought into a productive state; that the wealth and the number of freeholders of the country would be greatly increased thereby. Will not this bill have precisely the same effect?

If a man can now buy at the rate of one dollar per acre, lands which were previously held at $1 25 per acre, or if he can buy now for fifty cents what $1 25 was formerly asked for, or if he can buy now for twelve and a half cents lands which were formerly held at that higher price, will there not be many men who will then be able to buy and cultivate the lands who had been previously prevented from doing so in consequence of the high price? How, therefore, can those gentlemen who voted for the homestead bill prevail upon themselves to vote against this one?

The gentleman from New York inquires whether the bill is to benefit both the rich and the poor, or on which of these classes it is intended to confer benefits. Sir, I really never thought to ask myself that question. I am not in the habit of being actuated by such motives in legislating for the country. I do not care to inquire into this question now. I do not know whether the rich or the poor will profit most by it. I was going to say, and as a legislator I do say, that I do not care—though as a man perhaps I might. But, sir, I think it will be a greater benefit to the poorer classes than to the rich. Very few rich men care to buy three hundred and twenty, and no more, acres of land at this reduced price. It is a very little object to a rich man. Therefore, I think that a much larger proportion of those who are in needy circumstances will be benefited by this bill than of the wealthy.

But it is said that if the homestead bill passed by this House should become a law, there is no necessity for the bill now under discussion. Those who say so seem to forget that those who may become actual settlers under that homestead bill, are bound to settle on alternate sections and parts of sections, thus leaving as many sections and parts of sections not liable to the provisions of the homestead law as there are sections and parts of sections. This difficulty is intended to be obviated under the bill before us.

The land is not all of equal value. If you would be consistent, unless you reduce the price of certain lands, you ought to raise the price of others. I repeat what I said on this subject yesterday. It is absurd to hold at a uniform horizontal price all our public domain, differing as it does in value on account of quality, on account of the facility of getting to market, and on account of a thousand other reasons, which regulate the value of land in all countries. Either reduce the price of a portion of the lands which are now all fixed at the one price, or else raise the price of a portion of them so that the prices may correspond in some way with the real value of these lands.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] argues and objects, that if we pass this bill, actual settlers, instead of rushing over into the unoccupied territories, and crowding out the Indians, will stop and settle on their route in some of the older States. I see no objection in that.

Mr. DISNEY. I do.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, I cannot imagine what good objection there can be to that. I do not see what objection the gentleman from Ohio should have to have two hundred thousand acres of public lands in one of the older States settled on and cultivated under this law, as it would have the effect of causing—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr.
 COBB.]

Mr. COBB. I withdraw that amendment.

Objection was made to the withdrawal.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I move to amend by striking out the entire ninth section of the bill.

The ninth section, Mr. Chairman, provides that persons shall not enter more than three hundred and twenty acres of land under the provisions of this bill. Now, I am in favor of this bill, because it reduces and graduates the price of the public lands; because it enables the General Government to sell the lands and receive a revenue for them, which they will not be able to do so long as the lands are retained by the Government at the price of $1 25 per acre. I live in a new State, as well as other gentlemen who seem to have a contempt for the intelligence of everybody who happens to differ with them in opinion. I live in one of the new States; and I know that there are many thousands, and many hundreds of thousands acres of land in the State of Louisiana which never can be sold at the rate of $1 25 per acre; and there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres which can never be disposed of for a dollar, or even for seventy-five cents an acre; yet this very land might be sold for twenty-five cents, or twelve and a half cents per acre—a mere nominal price.
 The effect of offering these lands for such a small price would be to produce a revenue to the State of Louisiana, and to bring in a revenue to the General Government.

I do not say that persons should be confined to three hundred and twenty acres of land each.
 There are thousands of persons living in the South and West who want more than three hundred and twenty acres, for various purposes—for the purpose of lumbering and grazing, and various other uses.

I do not understand that we are here to legislate for classes. It is for the purpose of getting rid of the public lands, and deriving a revenue therefrom. That is the object of this bill, and that is the reason why I support it. But if this ninth section shall be adopted, it will defeat, in a great measure, the very object of this bill—or what ought to be the object of this bill—which is to get rid of the public domain, (which we have not heretofore been able to dispose of at $1 25 per acre) at twelve and a half cents per acre.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The effect of the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr.
 JONES,] if it be adopted by the committee, will be to subject all the land, under the operation of this bill, to general entry at a graduated price. When they shall be thrown upon the market at twelve and a half or twenty-five cents per acre, they will be entered, not by the section, or even by two sections, but in lots of thousands of acres, by capitalists, who will hold them in their hands, and will defeat the great object of the bill, which is to reduce the price, according to the time that they have been in the market unsold, and to place them into the hands of actual cultivators at reduced prices.

I am one of those who are uncompromisingly opposed to any and every system by which the public lands of this country can be so disposed of as to concentrate them in the hands of capitalists at a small price. Sir, it is wrong in policy, and wrong in principle. Could I have my views prevail in regard to the disposition of the public lands, I would repeal all laws which require that they shall be sold or offered at public sale; and when surveyed and ready to be placed in market, I would open the land offices for private entry by settlers at the lowest price for which the Government could afford to dispose of them. I would never permit this Government to sell one acre to any person except to those who would locate upon them, or who wanted them for their individual use. I would not limit them to three hundred and twenty acres, but to six hundred and forty, or perhaps to two sections, and then require them to live upon and cultivate a portion of it. It is wrong for this Government, holding all the public lands of the country, to put them into market and make merchandise of them, while those who give to them all their value—the actual settlers—shall be subject to be speculated upon by the capitalists of the country. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JONES,] to strike out the ninth section, will not prevail.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I ask for tellers upon the motion to strike out this section.

Mr. CHASTAIN moved a pro forma amendment, and said: Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of replying to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, who has just taken his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will feel it his duty to confine the gentleman in his remarks strictly to the explanation of his amendment.

Mr. CHASTAIN. That is what I propose to do. It will be recollected that the House has already passed one homestead bill; but the gentleman from Tennessee objects to striking out this section which prohibits any man from purchasing more than one hundred and sixty acres of land, because it will be inviting those who are not settlers to come into the market, where they will not be restricted to three hundred and twenty acres.
 Now, sir, I had supposed that the main object of the Government in bringing those lands into the market was, that they should be sold so as most to benefit the Government. But the course you are now taking would indicate that the object is to benefit the new States and those who settle upon the public lands. That is the object of the homestead bill which you have passed. You have provided that any person shall be entitled to go and enter free of cost one hundred and sixty acres of land, and you now provide in this bill that he may purchase at a reduced cost three hundred and twenty acres more, but further than that he is not permitted to go. And in this way you propose to dispose of your entire public domain.

Sir, if a man from one of the old States, who cannot go and settle upon the public lands, chooses to go into the market and purchase at $1 25 an acre, any quantity of land for which he may choose to pay the Government price, I know of no reason why he should not be permitted to do it.

Under the operation of this bill, if there are lands which have been thirty years in market, the settlers will get them at twelve and a half cents per acre—almost for nothing.

It seems to me you are legislating exclusively for one class of persons—the same class which your homestead bill is designed to benefit—those who move into the western country, and settle upon the lands. By this restriction in this bill, you legislate for the benefit of the settlers only, and exclude those in the old States, who cannot go there, from all the benefits arising from your public domain. Sir, that kind of legislation is unjust. It is not only unjust to the people of the old States, but it deprives the Government of the revenue which might otherwise accrue from the sale of the public lands. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana will prevail, and that the section will be stricken out.

Mr. SKELTON. I am opposed to this motion to strike out, for the reason that its adoption would defeat the object of the bill. As I said when I was up before, the object of this bill is to secure the settlement of the public lands. That object will be defeated by the removal of this restriction as proposed, because these lands would then be taken up by speculators and large monopolists, which would prevent their settlement for years to come.
 And while I shall give this bill my cordial support in its present form, should this section be stricken out I shall be compelled to vote against it.

But it seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, who has just taken his seat, will not apply with any great force to this bill. If it is desirable, as he seems to think, that wealthy persons should be allowed to go on the public lands, and take up large tracts to hold for their own benefit—if they wish to purchase more than three hundred and twenty acres, they can go on to the Government lands, upon which no restriction has been placed, and purchase any quantity they choose at the Government price; so that I do not see that this bill will work any great hardship upon that class of persons. But, as I said, the object of the bill is to secure the cultivation and settlement of the lands. We know very well the results of these land monopolies. We know that when these lands are once thrown into the hands of speculators, they will remain year after year without a cultivator.

The bill, if the amendment be adopted, will be to prevent settlement for years, because men with small capital will purchase large quantities for twelve and a half cents per acre, and hold them for a length of time. I hope the amendment will be rejected, without detaining the committee with further remarks which might be properly made.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the amendment to strike out the ninth section.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I call for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

So the House refused to strike out the ninth section.

Mr. COBB. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I submit the following, as a substitute for the bill:

A BILL to graduate the price of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the minimum price of the public lands of the United States, within the limits of the States, shall remain unchanged until the commencement of the fiscal year beginning July first, eighteen hundred and fifty-five, but after that period the price shall be reduced according to the following scale: All lands which shall have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold ten years, shall be reduced to the price of one dollar per acre; all lands which shall have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years, shall be reduced to seventy five cents an acre; and all lands which shall have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years, shall be sold at fifty cents an acre; and all lands which shall have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty five years, shall thereafter be reduced to a price of twenty five cents an acre; and all lands which shall have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years, shall thereafter be reduced to twelve and a half cents an acre: Provided, That no lands shall be sold at twelve and a half cents an acre until they shall have been previously subject to entry through a period of two years, at the price of fifty cents an acre.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever a State shall desire to acquire a preemption right to all the lands, or to all the lands of any certain class and price, as fixed by this act, within its borders, and signify the same to the President of the United States, by an act of its government, duly passed and authenticated, it shall be granted on the following terms, and in the manner hereinafter prescribed: That said State may fix the price of said lands above that prescribed in the first section of this act, reserving the excess to itself: Provided, That the title shall not pass to the purchaser until he has paid the price fixed, in the said first section, to the United States; which, upon said payment, and the presentation of a certificate of title from the State, duly authenticated, shall, through its proper officers, issue a patent for said land to the purchaser: Provided, however, That the lands shall be subject to the same legal subdivisions in the sale and survey as are now provided by law; nor shall the sites of fortifications, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and other public buildings, be considered as included within the provisions of this act: And provided further, That any State which shall accept the provisions of this act, shall take them in full of the five per centum fund hereafter to become due, or any part thereof which may not have been paid, and also of the sections reserved for schools; nor shall the graduating process from one dollar and twenty five cents to one dollar, to seventy five cents, to fifty cents, to twenty five cents, and to twelve and a half cents an acre take place until the lands in each class shall have been exposed to sale for a period of at least two years at the price herein prescribed for its class, after which the price of the said lands shall be reduced to that of the grade next below it in value as herein declared.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall in no way apply to town or village property, either in lots or out lots, nor be so construed as to interfere with any preemption claim, under any existing laws of the United States, nor to any of the mineral lands of the United States, the lands covered by such preemptions, or embracing such minerals, being hereby expressly excluded from the operations of this act; and full power and authority are hereby given to the Secretary of the Interior to make all needful rules and regulations for fully carrying into effect the several provisions of this act. The said Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to fix a uniform price according to some one of the classifications of this bill upon all the lands of a township where different parts of the same have been exposed to sale for different periods of time: Provided, however, That this provision shall not extend to town or village property, or to sections and special reservations made by the Department.

Mr. LETCHER. The committee is impatient, and I do not propose to detain it with any remarks upon this subject. The substitute is plain and intelligible, and gentlemen will have no difficulty in understanding it just as well without a word of remark from me as with it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That amendment, if I understand it, proposes to graduate the price of the public lands, and leave them subject to general entry by anybody and everybody, so that if one man had money enough he could enter the whole of them at this graduated price. I believe that is wrong in policy and principle, and I hope the committee will not adopt it.

Mr. GROW. I offer the following as a proviso to the first section of the substitute:

Provided, That no lands hereafter surveyed by the authority of the Government, except mineral lands and such reservations as have been or may be at any time made by Government for its own use, shall be exposed by proclamation or in any other way to public sale, but shall be subject to private entry only by actual settlers who make such entry for the purpose of settlement and cultivation.

I offer this amendment for the reason that as the substitute now stands it would, as is suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, leave your lands subject to entry in unlimited quantities at your graduated prices. Your graduation then would be for the benefit of the capitalists of the country desiring to make this kind of investment, and not for the benefit of the settlers. It would leave these lands open to be absorbed by capitalists; after the settlements surrounding your vacant lands have made them valuable, they come in just in advance of the settlers, take them out of the market, and hold them at an enhanced price, thus doing an injury to the labor of the country.

Is that the proper policy for this Government? Is it just on the part of this Government, when it has the control and disposal of these lands, to leave them to be disposed of in such a way as to injure the settlers without benefiting any interest in the country? Is it right for this Government, when it has discretion to place such restrictions on the disposal of the lands, as will best promote the great interests of the country, to leave them for the sole benefit of capitalists seeking that kind of investment? No, sir; the first duty of the Government is to take care of men who cultivate the land and make it valuable, and not allow the fruits of their labor to be taken by the capitalists of the country, thereby depriving them of the means of educating their families, and rearing them as respectable members of society, thus inflicting an injury on the country not to be computed in dollars and cents. The Government derives the same revenue whether the lands are taken by speculators or by settlers. The price is the same to all. The whole loss then is the amount of interest from the time when the lands would be purchased by speculators until the time of settlement by settlers. And for the sake of this small amount, is the Government to do an injury to an estimable class of citizens by a system of legislation benefiting the class of the community that is least deserving of benefit, if any is to be bestowed by the Government?

This system of benefits is all wrong upon the part of the Government. Let not the Government extend its hand to any class—to the strong against the weak—but let it throw around these public lands those securities and restrictions that will secure to the laborer the earnings that may be used for the support of his family, and the education of his children.

Mr. DISNEY. I wish to say that I desire to see this bill brought to a vote. Circumstances compel me to leave the Hall, and I should regret if the bill were to be put upon its passage during my absence. I have repeatedly expressed my opposition in every possible form to all the propositions which have been presented here to despoil the General Government of the public domain. I repeat now, before I leave the Chamber, that nothing, in my judgment, can be more absurd than to entertain any of these propositions, while you are pursuing the policy of throwing, annually, upon the market three or four times as much land as settlers can take up and occupy.

Mr. BISSELL. I regret, too, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is obliged to leave the Hall, before the vote is taken upon this bill; though his regret and mine ought to be somewhat lessened from the fact, that the House have heard his views upon this question. This bill as originally introduced was a very simple and plain proposition. It was a bill simply to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands. It is a measure that has long been demanded by the country. I regret, therefore, that other propositions have been brought in differing widely from that embraced in the original bill. I think there may be something worthy of consideration in the proposition emanating from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW,] as well as in the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] but I do not think that this is the time and occasion to entertain them. Let us pass this bill through the House, and then if the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Virginia have any valuable suggestions which they desire to make, they can present them afterwards in the form of a bill. The proposition embraced in the original bill is perfectly simple and plain, and I hope that the committee without further amendment will come to a vote immediately upon it.

The question was then taken on Mr. GROW's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would not be in order, until the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] is disposed of.

The question was then taken upon Mr. LETCHER's amendment; and it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the committee to the bill—being five sections to grant homesteads to actual settlers and cultivators.

Mr. COBB. Strike it all out.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not understand that the committee has reported this as a substitute. This is simply an amendment. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] gave notice that he would offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that it is an amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. JONES. It is an amendment which they proposed to the first part of the bill—the homestead part of it.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will move to strike it all out, that will settle the matter at once.

Mr. JONES. The committee does not insist upon the amendment, and the homestead bill has already passed.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Is it in order to move that the committee rise and report the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order while an amendment is pending. The question now is upon the amendment proposed to the homestead bill reported by the committee.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. CHASTAIN. Is there not a previous motion pending that the committee rise and report the bill, with a recommendation that it do not pass?

Mr. COBB. That is not pending now.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I understood that such a motion was made.

The CHAIRMAN. There is only one motion pending, and that is the one offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PHELPS. I would suggest to the gentleman, that he should modify his motion, and move that the committee lay aside the bill to be reported to the House, that we may take up other matters.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. FULLER] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 1,) granting portions of the public lands to actual settlers thereon, and to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, and had instructed him to report back the same, with certain amendments, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. If it is the wish of the House, the Clerk will read the several amendments, and then a vote will be taken upon all those together upon which a separate vote is not asked; and a separate vote will then be taken upon such as may be indicated by any gentleman while the Clerk is reading the amendments.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "agreed!"]

The Clerk then read the amendments.

Mr. TAYLOR. I now ask that the bill, with the amendments, may be read through, so that we may all understand precisely upon what we are to vote.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would suggest that it would be better to wait until the amendments are adopted, and then allow the bill, as amended, to be read.

No separate vote having been desired upon any amendment, the amendments were adopted in gross.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAVEN. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the House will not order them upon its engrossment, and then we may have them upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The bill as amended is as follows:

A BILL to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all of the public lands of the United States which shall have been in market for ten years and upwards, prior to the time of application to enter the same under the provisions of this act, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at the price of one dollar per acre; and all the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for fifteen years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at seventy-five cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at fifty cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty-five years and upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands of the United States that shall have been in market for thirty years or more, shall be subject to sale at twelve and a half cents per acre: Provided, This section shall not be so construed as to extend to lands reserved to the United States, in acts granting land to States for railroad or other internal improvements, or to mineral lands held at over one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That upon every reduction in price under the provisions of this act, the occupant and settler upon the lands shall have the right of preemption at such graduated price, upon the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations, upon which the public lands of the United States are now subject to the right of preemption, until within thirty days preceding the next graduation or reduction that shall take place; and if not so purchased, shall again be subject to right of preemption for eleven months as before, and so on from time to time, as reductions take place: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any right which has or may accrue by virtue of any act granting preemption to actual settlers upon public lands.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any person applying to enter any of the aforesaid lands, shall be required to make affidavit before the register or receiver of the proper land office, that he or she enters the same for his or her own use, and for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, or for the use of an adjoining farm or plantation, owned or occupied by him or herself, and together with said entry, he or she has not acquired from the United States, under the provisions of this act, more than three hundred and twenty acres, according to the established surveys; and if any person or persons taking such oath or affidavit shall swear falsely in the premises, he or she shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of perjury.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, Ball, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bridges, Carpenter, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, Dickinson, Drum, Edmunds, Everhart, Fuller, Goode, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Howe, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lindsey, Lyon, Macdonald, Meacham, Middleswarth, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peckham, Pratt, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Rogers, Rowe, Ruffin, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Simmons, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Upham, Walbridge, and Walley—66.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Caruthers, Churchill, Cobb, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dunbar, Eastman, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Fenton, Florence, Greenwood, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Henn, Hibbard, Hiester, Ingersoll, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Latham, Lilly, Lindley, McDougall, McMullin, Macy, Maxwell, May, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Peck, Phelps, Phillips, Thomas Ritchey, Skelton, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Andrew Stuart, John J. Taylor, Thurston, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—69.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. COBB. Upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to—yeas 77, noes not counted.

The House therefore, at a quarter past three o'clock, adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 14, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, made in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 4th instant, requesting him "to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of the correspondence of the United States Legation at Constantinople, and the United States Consulate at Smyrna, with Captain Ingraham, and with the Government of Austria, and with this Government—together with the instructions from this Government to their agents abroad touching the seizure and rescue of Martin Koszta, and the terms and conditions on which he was liberated and sent to this country," transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State, with copies of the said correspondence and papers; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill establishing an additional land office in the lower peninsula of Michigan.

GRADUATION BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be upon ordering to be engrossed and read a third time the bill of the House (No. 1) to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands, reported on yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. Was the previous question called upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered to be put, and the question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not believe that a quorum of the House is present, and therefore ask for a division on the question.

Mr. FULLER. Is it in order to move that there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not, for the reason that the previous question has been ordered to be now put.

Mr. COBB. Is not the previous question exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not, from the fact that the Chair has not announced the vote, a division of the House having been called.

Mr. COBB. Has not the call for a division of the House been withdrawn?

Mr. HAMILTON. I insist on a division of the House, that we may see whether a quorum be present.

The question was put; and, on a division, there were—yeas 42—

Mr. WENTWORTH. I demand the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PHELPS. I doubt whether a quorum is present; and, as we cannot have a call of the House, I move that the House do now adjourn, intending to vote against it myself. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I withdraw the motion for an adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Only twenty-one votes for ordering the yeas and nays, which is not a sufficient number.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether a quorum be present.

The Speaker counted those present, and found one hundred and fifteen—no quorum.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PHELPS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 9, nays 120.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion to adjourn over to Monday.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the motion, was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 68; as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time.

Mr. COBB. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question received a second.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. DISNEY. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Washburne, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, Yates, and Zollicoffer—80.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The main question was then ordered to be put; being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 64; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Benton, Bissell, Bugg, Caruthers, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cutting, John G. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Walley, Israel Washburne, and Witte—64.

So the bill passed.

Pending the call of the roll on the above vote, Mr. INGERSOLL, who was not within the bar when his name was called, asked unanimous consent to have his name recorded in the negative.

Objection was made.

Mr. COBB. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, and to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend the title, so as to make it read simply "A bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual cultivators and settlers."

The amendment was adopted; and then the title, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If that motion prevails, I shall endeavor to have the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill laid aside for the purpose of taking up and considering the deficiency bill, and the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. EDGERTON. This is private bill day, and I therefore move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the motion of the gentleman from Ohio takes precedence.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Edgerton's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is bill No. 51, "for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe."

This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, the sum of $3,000, being the amount of principal adjudged to be due and owing to the widow and heirs of said Beebe from the confederated tribes of the Sac and Fox Indians.

Mr. LETCHER. There was a motion, I believe, when the House was last in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not see the gentleman in the House who reported this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no motion pending to strike out the second section of the bill, as the Chair is informed by the Clerk.

Mr. LETCHER. I was under the impression that I had submitted that motion. If I did not, I submit the motion now to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. EASTMAN. I believe the bill has been discussed section by section, and I submit whether it is in order now to make the motion to strike out the second section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe, when the Committee of the Whole were last considering this bill, that the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORN,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, was entitled to the floor. A resolution was passed, after we went into the House, limiting debate upon this bill to five minutes, after the consideration of the bill should be again resumed in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk, that the motion to strike out the second section is still pending, and that motion is first to be considered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire whether I am not right, in point of fact, that a resolution has been passed limiting debate upon this bill?

Mr. EASTMAN. I find, upon reference to the Congressional Globe of the date of the 10th of March, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORN] offered a resolution, which was read and agreed to, to the effect "that all debate in Committee of the Whole upon the bill of the House (No. 51) for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, shall cease in five minutes after the consideration of it shall again be resumed by the committee, unless the committee shall sooner come to a conclusion thereon," &c. This settles the question.

Mr. WASHBURN. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that the bill is open to amendment after debate is closed?

The CHAIRMAN. It is; but the Chair is advised that the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] to strike out the second section is now pending, and the question must first be taken upon that.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask that the second section may be read, that the House may know what they are voting upon.

The second section was read, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to deduct the said sum of $3,016 from the first annuities to become due from the said confederate tribes of Sacs and Fox Indians."

Mr. LETCHER. Whatever may be the action of the House in regard to this bill, it seems to me that the second section, if the bill shall become a law, is calculated to operate with great injustice towards these Indians.

The House will recollect the facts in connection with this matter. This claim originated some twenty-odd years ago, and there is no evidence, either in this report or otherwise, to show that it was brought to the attention of the Indians at all until after an interval of some five or six years. The intercourse act, as I understand it, requires that the Indians shall have notice of such facts within one year, in order to hold them liable to the Government of the United States, and to reimburse the Government for any wrongs committed by them upon individual citizens. It seems to me that it would be a monstrous wrong to those people, when the Government of the United States, on its part, has not complied with the law in bringing the matter to the attention of the Indians, in order to give them an opportunity to explain it. It would be a great wrong to hold them responsible now, as they would be if this second section is not stricken out. Whatever, therefore, may be the action of Congress in regard to the allowance of this claim, it ought not to affect the Indians themselves.

Mr. WASHBURN. In regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] perhaps I have no objection, for it does not affect the party interested.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman that debate is in order only in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN. I intend to speak to the amendment. I was going on to say that it makes no difference to the party interested, whether this amendment be adopted or not. The Committee on Indian Affairs placed this section in the bill for the purpose, as I understand it, of giving a discretion to the Secretary of the Interior to deduct this amount from the annuity due to the tribe of Fox and Sacs Indians, if he should consider it just to do so. I think that is the true construction of it. He is merely authorized to deduct it; but it is not imperative upon him to do so.

One word more in regard to another matter which the gentleman from Virginia suggested, in relation to the claim as it was originally filed. I understand that one of the principal objections which the gentleman from Virginia had to the allowance of this claim, when the subject was discussed a few weeks ago, was that there was no evidence that the claim had been filed in the Indian office within a reasonable time after the depredations were committed.

I have here a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in regard to this subject, which removes entirely the objection then raised by that gentleman. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, March 2, 1854.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 23d ultimo, I have the honor to transmit herewith an extract of so much of list No. 2, of depredation claims forwarded by Superintendent Cumming to this office, as relates to the claim of Elijah Beebe. The case appears to have been filed in the office at St. Louis some time in 1822.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE W. MANNYPENNY, Commissioner.
Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, House of Representatives.

It will be recollected that these depredations were committed some time during the month of October, 1821, so that, as I remarked, that the principal objection of my friend from Virginia is thus obviated by the testimony which I have here adduced.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman is altogether mistaken in the conclusion to which he comes. In the first place there were other objections quite as important as the one to which he alludes, which I urged against this bill; but even this point is not proved at all. The letter says the claim was filed some time in the year 1822. Now, sir, the depredations were alleged to have been committed in the month of October, 1821, and you have no evidence in the letter that it was filed within a year.

Mr. WASHBURN. The probability is that it was; but whether it was or not, in point of fact makes no difference, as it was not required to be filed within that time, there being no limitation in the intercourse law of 1802. This claim does not come under the limitations of the intercourse law of 1834. That act prescribes a certain limit within which claims arising under it must be filed in the office of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs. But there was no such limitation in the law of 1802. But, sir, a gentleman is referred to in the report of the committee as certifying to the character and credibility of the witnesses—the honorable gentleman from Missouri—who is now in his seat; and I presume he knows something of the history of this matter. I desire to ask him if such be the fact, and if he will state to the committee his knowledge of this claim?

Mr. BENTON. This is five-minute debate, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BENTON. Plenty of time, and some to spare, for so good a case as this is. In the first place these parties are as good people as ever lived in the world. Mr. Beebe and his wife were Connecticut people. I am a cotemporary of the time when these depredations were committed. Mr. Beebe died very soon afterwards, as it has been stated. His children were then very young, and it was not until a very long time afterwards that they were able to attend to this claim themselves.

Now, sir, I know all about this matter. It has been shown that it did not come under the intercourse act of 1802. That is a certain point. If it had come under that act, the claim would not have been here. If it were a case coming properly within the letter of that act, it would have been settled by the Department. But it does come under the policy of that act. Sir, what was the reason—what was the whole policy of that act? As has been stated, it was to preserve peace upon our frontiers. How preserve peace? Why by providing for settling the claims of the people upon the frontiers, when the Indians had crossed the line and committed depredations upon their property, and they did not pursue the Indians and take satisfaction upon them, and thereby bring war upon the frontiers. That is the policy and the reason of this intercourse act. It is to preserve peace upon your frontiers.

Now what difference does it make in the reason or the policy of the act, whether the depredations were committed inside or outside of the line? This, to be sure, was on the outside; but the stock of all the frontier people is ranging on the outside; and the reason and policy is still the same for paying in a case in which private satisfaction is not taken when the property or stock is taken outside of the line, as when taken inside of the line.

I know all about the case, sir. I know that it comes within the reason and policy of the intercourse law of 1802, to preserve peace on the frontiers, and I hope it will be passed. It is thirty years old now, and it is time that it should be passed.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri, if he has any knowledge on the subject, when notice was given to these Indians that such a claim existed and was urged against them? From the papers it appears that it was fifteen years afterwards, for the first time.

Mr. BENTON. I do not know anything about that; but I think that the United States ought to pay the claim.

The question was taken on the amendment, to strike out the second section; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. EASTMAN. I now move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order closing debate, the Chair is of opinion that the bill ought to be reported to the House now. If it be the unanimous consent of the committee, it will be laid aside, to be reported with others which may be acted on.

Mr. HASTINGS. I called for a division of the committee on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] before the result was announced by the Chair. I do not believe that the committee understand the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the call for a division is now too late.

Mr. HASTINGS. I called for a division before the result was announced.

Mr. PECKHAM. I heard the gentleman call for a division, as he states.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sure that the committee do not understand the effect of the vote. If I am in order, I insist that there be a division of the committee on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the question will be again taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the second section.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HAVEN. It seems to be well understood that the only operation of striking out this section, is simply to prevent the charging of this money to those Indians who have received their annuities regularly for some thirty years. I think it better that the amendment should be adopted, and then that the bill should be reported to the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and EASTMAN were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was House bill No. 58, "for settling the claims of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, deceased."

The bill was read.

The first section directs the proper officers of the Treasury to settle the claim of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, on their producing the testimony required by the commission from claimants under the Florida treaty, which, in the opinion of the said officers, shall be satisfactory as establishing said claim according to law and usage. Section second directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount found due out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided, that more shall not be paid than said Meade would have received out of the $5,000,000 appropriated to pay claimants under the Florida treaty, if his claim had been admitted by the commissioners.

Several MEMBERS. Read the report.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the committee has a desire to be edified by the reading of the report, which I believe is but about seventy-five or eighty pages of printed matter, I have no objection.

I rise to say that this is a bill of very considerable consequence, if it be paid from the Treasury, to the country, and of no less consequence, if it be paid, to those who are pressing the claim. The committee is very thin, indeed, and rather impatient, and if it be consistent with the sense of propriety of the committee that they should pass over this bill informally to-day, in order that it may come up under more favorable circumstances, when the whole of the case might be laid before the committee at one time, I shall feel gratified. I am ready, however, to go on now, but this is not a favorable time to commence it, and if there be no objection, I ask that the bill be passed over informally.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. COBB. I object. We had better consider it now. Now is the time to consider it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will then make a brief statement of the case. This is a case not entirely new to the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Cannot a motion be made to postpone this bill for one week?

Mr. CHANDLER. You cannot make that motion in committee.

This is a bill that is founded upon a claim against the Government of Spain by the heirs and legal representatives of Richard W. Meade. Although I had intended to occupy some considerable time in the discussion of this matter, I shall now confine myself to a simple statement of the case, forbearing to make any remarks upon the injuries that the claimants have already suffered by the delay of Congress to compensate them for their losses, and forbearing also to trouble the members of this House by any reference to the inconveniences which have been suffered by the family; not choosing to refer directly to the res angusta domi of any person, especially those of the claimants who are presented here under such favorable circumstances.

Richard W. Meade, a native of this country, transacted business for himself in Spain. Spain then was not, as now, the claimant of one single island, a small tributary upon our coast, but she was a great commercial country, not having relinquished her claim to priority of trade in the East, and owning the sovereignty of almost the whole of Spanish America; almost the whole, indeed, of Central America at that time—

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, as this is Good Friday, I will move that the committee rise. I should prefer the gentleman to make his remarks upon this bill when there is a full attendance of members present.

The question was then taken upon Mr. CLINGMAN's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and more especially House bill No. 51, being a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, and had directed him to report back the same with an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now ask the House to put the bill upon its passage, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be upon the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the following words:

"Be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to deduct the sum of $3,016 from the first annuities to become due to the said confederated tribes of the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians."

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question then being, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill being engrossed, it was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

WEST POINT ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HAVEN. The last bill having been disposed of, I desire to ask the House to go back into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for five minutes perhaps, not more, to make a disposition of an appropriation bill. I refer to the West Point Military Academy bill. It has been reported to the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, after having passed the Senate with amendments, and has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and there are three amendments of the Senate to it which are in controversy between the House and Senate. I desire to go into committee and dispose of those amendments, and get the matter out of the way. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EASTMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. I believe the question is now upon my motion to go into committee. I desire to say to the House that this matter has laid here for two months; and, although there is, perhaps, no pressing immediate necessity, I wish to show to the House the disposition of the Ways and Means to get along with business as rapidly as we can. I think the consideration of these amendments will not consume but a very few minutes.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HAVEN; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of New York, in the chair.)

Mr. HAVEN. I move that all preceding business be laid aside, and that the House take up for consideration the West Point Military Academy bill.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. Can such a motion be entertained? Must not each bill upon the Calendar preceding the West Point Academy bill be laid aside as it comes up?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be unanimous consent, it may be done.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York has the right to make that motion. The West Point Academy bill is a general appropriation bill; and it is in order, under the rules, to move to take up that bill, without moving to lay aside any other bill. The motion having been made, the vote must be taken whether the House will take up that bill.

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. I ask that the amendments to the bill may be read.

The Clerk read them, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill:

For repairs and additional professors' quarters, $5,000.

For cavalry exercise hall, $20,000.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of professors of French and drawing shall be made equal to that of the professors in the other departments; and that the compensation of the master of sword be $1,200 per annum.

Mr. HAVEN. The Committee of Ways and Means, who had these amendments of the Senate to the bill under consideration, came to the conclusion to report, and did report adversely in reference to them all, and recommended a non-concurrence.

The first amendment is in reference to quarters for the professors. The committee thought if this were adopted it would be only laying the foundations for the erection of new buildings, which are not necessary for the comfort and proper accommodation of the occupants, and which would require large appropriations in future to complete them. They thought this unwise, and therefore reported in favor of non-concurring in this amendment of the Senate.

The second amendment is in reference to an appropriation for building a riding hall for the cadets. There was some doubt in the minds of the committee as to the propriety of this appropriation; but the committee concluded to report in opposition to it. The controlling reason, so far as I was concerned—and I have no doubt it was substantially so with other members of the committee—in coming to such a conclusion, was this: while we thought that the hall for which the appropriation was asked might be made useful, and at certain seasons of the year might be said to be necessary, in the instruction of the cadets, yet, in consideration of the fact that this same question has been up before the House year after year, and rejected, we were of the opinion that an endeavor to ingraft it into the bill again would have the effect to bring the institution, to some extent, into a kind of discredit. I said this amendment has been here year after year nearly as long as I can remember, and has generally been made a subject of ridicule in debate on this floor; and I do not doubt that such debate has the effect of weakening the institution in the mind of the public.

I have seen some of the professors of the academy in relation to the matter; they are intelligent, honorable, and reliable men. I have great confidence in their judgment. They say the amendment ought to pass. They say the hall is very desirable for the purposes of instruction, and that during the fall and spring seasons of the year, without it, cavalry instructions must cease, owing to climate and the nature of the soil when frozen and when breaking up; but after a full consideration of the subject, the committee agreed to report in favor of non-concurring in this amendment also, and I hope this committee will adopt the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The other amendment of the Senate non-concurred in by the Committee of Ways and Means, is the second section of the bill which proposes an increase in the compensation of the professors of French and drawing, so as to be equal to that of the professors in the other departments, and that the compensation of the master of the sword shall be $1,200 per annum. The Committee of Ways and Means thought no sufficient reasons were apparent for this proposed change, and they recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment also.

Mr. Chairman, I, for one, am, and I believe every one of the committee which had this matter in charge are, friendly to this institution, and have every desire to cherish and protect it. I would not withhold from it one cent that would promote its usefulness and prosperity. Nay, sir, from an overflowing treasury I would give liberally; but, sir, it should be with due and proper discrimination; and the Committee of Ways and Means thought that these views would be best promoted by making the disposition of these amendments that I have pointed out. We are not wedded to these opinions, however, if a majority here think a concurrence in one, or all, of these amendments would be wiser. I think, sir, that this committee now understand the position of the bill and amendments, and I hope it will act promptly in the matter, and either concur with the Committee of Ways and Means or non-concur, for with either course I shall be satisfied. Although I believe that the permanent interests of the institution will be best promoted by concurring with the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BISSELL. Not having had the opportunity of hearing the first portion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, I am not able to understand what the Committee of Ways and Means recommend in reference to these amendments.

Mr. HAVEN. We recommend the striking out of the appropriation of $5,000 for additional quarters for the professors; also, the appropriation of $20,000 for a riding hall; and also striking out the second section.

Mr. BISSELL. I now ask that all the amendments may be read, so that we can see what they are.

The Clerk again read the amendments.

Mr. BISSELL. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the two appropriations proposed to be stricken out—the one of $5,000 for houses for the officers at West Point, and the other of $20,000 for the erection of a suitable riding-hall, were recommended by the Board of Visitors, men indiscriminately taken from all sections of the country, selected for their presumed fitness for that and other kindred objects. After their visit to the Academy, and examination into the wants of the institution, they strongly recommended these two appropriations. These appropriations, or at least the one providing for the erection of a suitable riding-hall, have been recommended by the War Department for several years in succession, and strongly urged by those who are presumed to be most familiar with the wants and necessities of that institution.

But I have heretofore voted against the proposed appropriation for the riding-hall without much investigation, and on what was the popular idea here and elsewhere, that the young men who go to West Point should be drilled out of doors, and inured to out-door exercise; a policy which a riding-hall would interfere with; and that to erect such a building for them to ride in, a cover to protect them from the weather or any other inconvenience, was but an admonition to them to become as effeminate as possible in all those things in which they were being trained. But since I have had the honor of being chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I have taken occasion to look more closely into the subject, and have become convinced that a suitable riding-hall is absolutely necessary, not so much for the convenience of the cadets; not for their comfort, which I do not take into the account at all at this time, but for the benefit of the institution, and in order that the Government may derive all advantages which it is entitled to expect from an institution kept up at no inconsiderable expense. I am assured that without such a hall the cadets cannot be drilled on horseback more than about three months in the year. Do not let it be supposed that it is on account of the cold, the rain, or the snow, so far as they affect the cadets themselves, that they cannot be so drilled. It is on account, rather, of the horses.

This institution is located pretty far north, and pretty high up. Its latitude and altitude are both well up. It is a cold place. There are short summers and long winters. The snow lies deep there in winter, and it rains much in fall and spring. The ground is liable to be covered with ice, with deep snow, or with snow partially formed into ice, presenting a rough and hummocky surface, but still very slippery. This, in those peculiar, difficult, and prompt movements required in drilling a platoon of mounted men, is dangerous to the limbs and necks of the horses, to say nothing of the safety of their riders.

So it is again, in spring and fall, when the ground is being released from the frost—or, as we say, the ground is breaking up—a slow process in that high latitude. At such times, it will readily be perceived that ground, trampled upon by horses every day, must become plungy, and unfit for the purpose of teaching horses military exercise. It should be borne in mind that this is peculiar business—not plain straightforward riding, such as we who are here sometimes do. In this exercise horses are required to perform their evolutions side by side, and in very close proximity, as well as simultaneously. If the ground be soft and miry—if it be half frozen, but yet not sufficiently so to bear the horse and his rider—or if it be icy, and the horse liable to slip—and every abrupt or sudden turn or halt, with what advantage can horseback drill be prosecuted?

But, despite all these things, there might still be left some four or five months in the year, when cavalry exercise might be had but for another reason which I will mention. It is well known that for two or three months during the summer the cadets are required to leave the Academy for the purpose of being drilled in camp, and as infantry. This is an indispensable part of their instruction. This takes from their cavalry exercise during the most favorable part of the season. On the whole, as I have already stated, the cadet, as things now are, can scarcely receive more than three months instruction in cavalry exercise during the year. Erect a suitable riding-hall, and he may receive nine months instruction.

Now, the Government is at the expense of keeping over ninety horses at West Point, for no other purpose than the one I have indicated. They are of use scarcely more than three months in the year. By granting the appropriation here asked for, they may be of service nine months in the year. Does not economy require, then, that this appropriation be made? It is not intended, of course, that the hall shall be used except at such times as the state of the ground forbids outdoor exercise. The whole amount of this matter is just this: that at present we do not get the advantage we ought to derive from this institution, considering the expense it has been and still is to the Government annually; and if we would get all the advantage which we are entitled to receive, considering that expense, we must make this additional appropriation for this very necessary appendage to the institution.

Mr. BENTON. This riding house is not absolutely a new acquaintance with me. I recollect, years ago, applications were made, some of which were successful, for appropriations for this house for equitation—learning to ride on horseback. I believe they were called “exercises in equitation,” which being translated into English, means riding on horseback. [Laughter.] I recollect that about 1836, $30,000 were appropriated at one time for this house for exercising in equitation, which sum was in addition to the appropriations made before. I thought when that $30,000 was added, that we should have no more of these appropriations, but here is an application for $20,000 more. I have read the recommendation which the visitors have made in behalf of it. Doubtless the visitors are very clever and popular men.

But I have been accustomed to look at the reports which come from these visitors at West Point as coming from the professors themselves, through the instrumentality of a committee of these visitors. Every one of the reports which I have examined seems to be drawn up by the head of the branch of business which that particular section of the board is assigned to examine. I never had a good opinion of these boards of visitors. When we paid them a trifle there was an overwhelming number of applications to get appointments as visitors to West Point, and members of Congress often carried the day, getting a little mileage and some small pay besides. We afterwards stopped this, but made appropriations for subsistence and dinners, while the visitors remained there; and such is the love of office and compensation of some kind or other, that for a mere belly full of meat and wine there has always been a throng of applicants to the War Office for appointments upon the Board of Visitors.

For near twenty years I was chairman of the Senate's Committee on Military Affairs. From my position, and from the fact of having once belonged to the Army myself, I was a sort of natural line of visitors to West Point, but I would never go there. The reason why was this: I knew that no persons who begged their appointment there as visitors would ever sign a report that I would draw up, and I knew that I never would sign a report which they would draw up, or would be drawn up for us; and so I never went there. I recollect very well the old debates about this riding-house. I am not able to say how many appropriations were made for it, but I recollect one of $30,000. When that was made, members from the West were astonished at hearing of the hardships of these young gentlemen, in having to ride upon horseback in cold weather, in hail and snow, and also in the hot, burning sun, and it was suggested by various members that it would be economy to reduce the young gentlemen to the degree of protection against bad weather, to which the young women and the old women of New England were subjected, by giving them a parasol for the sun, an umbrella for the rain, and a pelisse for a cold day. It was then said by New England men—and I could name one gentleman who said that the young women and the old women of his State all rode about during all kinds of weather in the open air; and New England was further north than West Point; and that the people of the country worked in the open air, not two or three hours a day, but for the whole day; and that their sons did the same—even half-grown boys.

Well, the objections were voted down, and the appropriations were carried—how many I do not know, but I recollect one of $30,000. A great many members of Congress had sons in the academy about that time. When I read the other day the recommendation of those visitors, and saw the appeal they made for help to the young gentlemen; when I saw the words "danger to life and limb"—those were the words, I think; am I mistaken?

Mr. HAVEN. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BENTON. "Danger to life and limb"—were not those the words?

Mr. HAVEN. Those are the words, I believe.

Mr. BENTON. "Danger to life and limb;" not of the horses, but of the young cadets in learning to ride in such naughty houses which had cost so much money. When that was read in my family, it was suggested by some of the children that the floor be carpeted, and mattresses be placed around the room, so that when the young men roll off their horses they may roll up against the mattresses, so as not to endanger "life and limb." [Laughter.] Why, sir, the five-year old boys of the Utah nation would be ashamed to have themselves put into a house to learn to ride. These five-year old boys will drive away the stock outside of any stockade in which these house-taught riders command, who have learned to perform equestrianism in a house. [Laughter.] I have authority for saying these five-year old Utah boys would gallop around these house-taught riders all day, and drive off their stock in their view.

I want the yeas and nays upon the amendments when we get to the place for them—when the bill gets into the House, and I wish the provision in regard to the entertainment of the visitors stricken out. Surely, the race has not gone by, the race is not wholly extinct, who do something for their country without a mercenary motive, and a reward either in meat or money. I can recollect when the heads of the community, men of some age, who had acted their parts, and provided for themselves and their families, were ready to give up some share of time for the benefit of eleemosynary and charitable institutions, and for public institutions, such as colleges and universities, and do it at their own expense. And then a high order of men were got for the purpose. Now, disinterested service is getting out of date. Congress offers inducement, in meat or money, to get visitors. Those who value the inducement apply for the place, and get it. High-minded men will not contend with them. The visitation falls into unfit hands, and the result is a report from the professor himself, fathered by a committee of the visitors who have begged their places, and get their meat and wine free while wondering at what is shown them, and signing what is drawn up for them.

Mr. HAVEN was here recognized by the Chair; Mr. CHASTAIN endeavoring to obtain the floor at the same time.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a moment to correct a misapprehension?

Mr. HAVEN. I will, if I have the floor, and I believe I have.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I claim the floor, Mr. Chairman. I want to know if it has come to this, that a gentleman cannot be recognized after he has got the eye of the Chairman? Is the floor to be farmed out forever and ever?

Mr. HAVEN. I would like to accommodate my friend from Georgia, for I certainly do not propose to discuss further this subject of riding. I understand my friend from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] desires to make an explanation, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. BISSELL. I have only a few words to say.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I insist upon my right to the floor.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, the Chair must decide who has the floor.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I supposed that I was recognized by the Chair, and therefore am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York first, and he understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] desires to make an explanation, and asks the gentleman from New York to yield for that purpose.

The gentleman from New York has yielded for that purpose; and the gentleman from Illinois has the floor. But the Chair, aware that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CHASTAIN] desired to obtain the floor, sent a messenger to him, to say that he would recognize him immediately after the gentleman from New York yielded the floor, if he then claimed it.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow me to say that I propose to leave the city very soon; and I wanted very much to make a few remarks upon the Nebraska question before I left. That was the reason of my anxiety to obtain the floor at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHASTAIN. The gentleman from Illinois did not get the floor; and I object to its being farmed out in this manner.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish simply to say, that there is not a gentleman upon this floor to whom I would more cheerfully yield than the gentleman from Georgia; but—

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that he only yielded the floor to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] for explanation, and that he still claims it?

Mr. BISSELL. Oh, no. I gave up the floor altogether to the gentleman from Missouri, and now only asked the gentleman from New York to yield it to me for an explanation.

Mr. SEWARD. Is it competent for one gentleman to obtain the floor, and yield it to another?

The CHAIRMAN. He may yield it for explanation.

Mr. SEWARD. I know it has been the custom to yield it on all occasions; but what I desired to know was, whether he had a right under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. He has, for explanation. The Chair decides that the gentleman from New York is upon the floor, and he will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. My rights here are equal to those of any other member, and I mean to insist upon the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor; and from this decision the gentleman from Georgia appeals. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. HAVEN. I submit that it is not an appealable case. The committee have no right to determine, and cannot determine, whether the Chair saw me first, or the gentleman from Georgia. That is a question which the Chair must decide for himself. It depends upon his vision and knowledge only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was very well aware of the fact that it was not a question upon which an appeal could be taken, but he thought it would be the easiest way to settle the question between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Georgia, as to who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CHASTAIN] as having taken any appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I have certainly taken no appeal from the decision of the Chair. The appeal I made was to the courtesy of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. HAVEN. I only desire to say one word for the purpose of putting this matter right in reference to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CHASTAIN.] There is no gentleman in this House to whom I would have sooner yielded the floor than to that gentleman. I know of no other gentleman whom I would sooner oblige; but I believe I am under some obligations to the House in reference to the discussion upon this bill to-day, so far as I can control it, because it was rather as a matter of grace that the House consented to go into committee upon it when I asked them to do so. The gentleman from Georgia indicates his purpose to address the committee upon the territorial question, and it seems to me it would be encroaching rather too much upon the kindness and good graces of the House, for me to be a party to a speech on that subject, after such consent was given to go into committee upon this bill, with the understanding that no general discussion of other subjects would take place. I say, under these circumstances, it would be encroaching too much upon the indulgence of the House for me, now, to yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CHASTAIN,] for the purpose indicated by him.

The gentleman from Illinois, however, has desired me to yield him the floor for the purpose of making some explanation in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, and I yield him the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BISSELL. I did not very distinctly understand all the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] If, however, he intended any portion of them heard by me as a reply to what I had previously said, then he must have entirely misunderstood me, notwithstanding the very great pains I took to avoid any such misunderstanding on the part of any one. I expressly stated to the committee that this appropriation was not asked for upon the ground that it was necessary to protect the cadets from the weather. I stated that this was not the purpose for which this hall was required, but that it was required for the safety of the horses, to say nothing about the cadets; and to allow of their being drilled and exercised appropriately for eight or nine months in the year instead of three or four, as is now the case. And how is this argument replied to? Why, by intimating that the call for this appropriation is with a view to protect and screen the cadet from the vicissitudes of the weather! And something is said in this connection about their being less willing to brave inclement weather, or less able to do it, than the young women of New England—and parasols and warm clothing is suggested for them. Now, sir, is that any reply to my argument? Or, rather, is it a fair response to the plain statement of fact which I presented?

Then again we are told that the Utah boys of five years old can ride the wildest horses, &c., &c., and they are not taught in riding halls. But what has all that to do with the question before this committee? Is this establishment kept up for them? We all know very well that the Utah, as well as various other tribes of Indians, are remarkable for their horsemanship; perhaps they are not surpassed by any nation or tribe of people on the globe. But what, I ask again, has all that to do with the question whether a riding hall shall be erected at West Point?

Mr. Chairman, I repeat then, and it is all I have to say, that this appropriation is asked for because it is believed that without it the Government will not receive the full benefit of the expense it has incurred in keeping up that institution. There are but few months in the year, comparatively a small portion of the year, when the horses can be exercised under the existing state of things at West Point.

Mr. BENTON. I was replying to the visitors.

Mr. HAVEN. I move that the committee do now rise, with a view of closing debate on this bill. We may then resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole, and finish the bill under a five-minutes discussion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. JONES, of New York] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to House bill (No. 47) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point for the year ending June 30, 1855, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HAVEN. I now move the usual resolution to close debate on the Military Academy appropriation bill within five minutes after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall again resume its consideration.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion I think that I can accommodate that side of the House. I wish to accommodate the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CHASTAIN,] and I understand that it will meet with his wishes if he can have the floor for five minutes. He can then print what portion of his remarks he may not desire to deliver at length to-day.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I am obliged to the gentleman. I will try to avail myself of the rule again. If the gentleman had been so kind awhile ago, as to extend me that courtesy, I might have accepted it.

Mr. HAVEN. I demand tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BENSON and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to, and thereupon, at twenty minutes to three o'clock, p. m., the House adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the women of Sandisfield, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of any act, directly or indirectly, legalizing slavery in the Territories of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, two petitions of inhabitants of Andover, Massachusetts, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition signed by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe and other women, of Massachusetts, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEWARD presented additional documents in relation to the claim of the representatives of John Shultz, for remuneration for services rendered by him during the revolutionary war; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, a remonstrance from citizens of Berrien county, Michigan, against the passage of the Nebraska-Kansas bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial signed by citizens of Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, praying that the homestead bill may be so amended as that each citizen, who has heretofore purchased one hundred and sixty acres of public land, may be refunded the amount paid by him with interest thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a memorial of the Board of Trade and Merchants' Exchange, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying that an appropriation may be made for deepening the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a petition of citizens of Marshall county, Iowa, praying the establishment of a mail route from Toledo to Eldorado, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MASON presented a petition of citizens of Alexandria, Virginia, praying a reduction of the Ordered, That so much of the memorial as relates to the construction of a road, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and that so much thereof as relates to the transportation of the mails, and the construction of a telegraph, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present to the Senate the memorial of D. McManus, a chaplain in the Army, now at Fort Gibson, praying to be allowed a land warrant; which I move may be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

I do not know upon what law or regulation their position is based, or in what light their position ought to be regarded in reference to the application now made for bounty land; but as a new principle is to be adopted, or rather an old one is asked to be extended to a new class of cases, I move to refer it to the Pension Committee. I am glad now in this connection, however, to say, that if the clergy are connected with, incorporated with the Army as chaplains, or had any permanent connection with the Army during the war with Mexico, they ought not to be excluded from the same character of compensation at some fair rate, which has been allowed and conferred upon others. If they are actually connected with the Army, (and I understand they are, and are miserably paid,) it seems to me little short of a degradation and an outrage to exclude them from compensation and benefits which have been made to all other classes.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the memorial of members of the bar at Detroit, Michigan, praying an increase of the salary of the United States district judge for Michigan, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the petition of Benjamin Arnold be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Steptoe and others, praying satisfaction for lands granted by the State of Georgia, in 1784, and afterwards ceded to the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

HON. TRUMAN SMITH.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be requested to inform the Executive of the State of Connecticut that the Hon. TRUMAN SMITH, one of the Senators from said State, did, on the 11th instant, resign his seat in the Senate of the United States, to take effect from and after the 24th day of May next.

POSTAL OPERATIONS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to ascertain, and report for the information of the Senate.

First. The number of dead letters in the last postal year; and the proportion or per cent. of them not prepaid; and the amount of postage, known or estimated, which would have been received, or required for the prepayment of such of said letters as were not prepaid.

Second. What is the total weight of some given large number of dead letters, taken at random, at the dead letter office, and of those so weighed and counted; what is the total weight and number of those now rated at single postage; and, separately, the total weight and number of those now rated at more than single postage.

Third. In each of several of the large offices, supposed to be a fair average, in that respect, of the business of the country, what is the total weight of some given large number of letters deposited or delivered; and of those so weighed, what is the number and weight of those now rated at single postage, and, (separately) of those now rated at more than single postage.

Fourth. What proportion or per cent., in number, of the letters now mailed, are, in the opinion of the clerks and postmasters, and of the Postmaster General, probably of a weight not exceeding one fourth of an ounce each?

Fifth. In the opinion of the opening clerks at the dead-letter office, what proportionate part of the surface of paper of the letters opened by them is blank, i. e., what is the average proportion or per cent. of blank surface, as compared with the written surface.

Sixth. How well or sufficiently is the present rate charged upon advertised letters found to compensate for the cost of advertising, and what is the greatest loss to the Department, in any one of the last six years, in the cost of advertising letters over and above the receipts of the Department for advertising them.

Seventh. What is the number of clerks or persons now and heretofore required or employed in the General Post Office, in examining, computing, recording, and comparing the returns alone.

Eighth. What is the number of letters earned in the British mails in the last year, of which a report has been received; and what the number the year prior to the adoption of uniform penny postage.

Ninth. For how many years has the British penny postage been a source of revenue over and above the expenses; and what was the amount of such net revenue in the year last reported?

COLLECTION DISTRICT IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating an additional collection district in the State of California, to be composed of the counties of Humboldt, Trinity, Yreka, and Klamath.

LAND DISTRICT IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating a new land district in the State of California, to be composed of the counties of Humboldt, Trinity, Yreka, and Klamath.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that they had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the House bill for the relief of William B. Edwards, and to the House bill for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army.

Also, that the House had passed the bill from the Senate for the relief of John Gusman, of Louisiana.

Also, that they had passed a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe; and

A bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual cultivators and settlers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed three enrolled bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore then signed the enrolled bills for the relief of William B. Edwards; for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army; and for the relief of the legal representatives of Isaac P. Simonton.

SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I beg leave to present to the Senate a petition, with some fifteen thousand names appended to it, upon a very singular and novel subject. The petitioners represent, that certain physical and mental phenomena of mysterious import have become so prevalent in this country and Europe as to engross a large share of public attention.

A partial analysis of these phenomena attest the existence:

First. Of an "occult force," which is exhibited in sliding, raising, arresting, holding, suspending, and otherwise disturbing ponderable bodies, apparently in direct opposition to the acknowledged laws of matter; and transcending the accredited powers of the human mind.

Secondly. Lights of various forms and colors, and of different degrees of intensity, appear in dark rooms, where chemical action, or phosphorescent illumination, cannot be developed, and where there are no means of generating electricity, or of producing combustion.

Thirdly. A variety of sounds, frequent in occurrence, and diversified in character, and of singular significance and import, consisting of mysterious rappings, indicating the presence of invisible intelligence. Sounds are often heard like those produced by the prosecution of mechanical operations—like the hoarse murmurs of the winds and waves, mingled with the harsh creaking noise of the masts and rigging of a ship laboring in a rough sea. Concussions also occur, resembling distant thunder, producing oscillatory movements of surrounding objects, and a tremulous motion of the premises upon which these phenomena occur. Harmonious sounds as of human voices, and other sounds resembling those of the fife, drum, trumpet, &c., have been produced without any visible agency.

Fourthly. All the functions of the human body and mind are influenced, in what appear to be certain abnormal states of the system, by causes not yet adequately understood or accounted for. The "occult force" or invisible power, frequently interrupts the normal operation of the faculties, suspending sensation and voluntary motion, and reducing the temperature of the body to a death-like coldness and rigidity; and diseases hitherto considered incurable have been entirely eradicated by this mysterious agency.

The petitioners proceed to state that two opinions prevail with respect to the origin of these phenomena. One ascribes them to the power and intelligence of departed spirits, operating upon the elements which pervade all material forms; the other rejects this conclusion, and contends that all these results may be accounted for in a rational and satisfactory manner.

The memorialists, while thus disagreeing as to the causes, concur in opinion as to the occurrence of the alleged phenomena, and in view of their origin, nature, and bearing upon the interests of mankind, demand for them a patient, rigid, scientific investigation; and request the appointment of a scientific commission for that purpose.

I have now given a faithful synopsis of this petition, which, however unprecedented in itself, has been prepared with singular ability, presenting the subject with great delicacy and moderation. I make it a rule to present any petition to the Senate which is respectful in its terms, upon any subject which the petitioners may desire to bring to the attention of this body. But having discharged this duty I may be permitted to say, that the prevalence of this delusion, at this age of the world, amongst any considerable portion of our citizens, must originate, in my opinion, in a defective system of education, or in a partial derangement of the mental faculties, produced by a diseased condition of the physical organization. I cannot, therefore, believe that it prevails to the extent indicated in this petition. Different ages of the world have had their peculiar delusions. Alchemy occupied the attention of eminent men for several centuries. But there was something sublime in alchemy. The philosopher's stone, or the transmutation of base metals into gold, the elixir vite, or water of life, which would preserve youth and beauty, and prevent old age, decay, and death, were blessings which poor humanity ardently desired, and which alchemy sought to discover by perseverance and piety.

Roger Bacon, one of the greatest alchemists, and greatest men of the thirteenth century, whilst searching for the philosopher's stone, discovered the telescope, burning glasses, and gunpowder. The prosecution of that delusion led, therefore, to a number of useful discoveries. In the sixteenth century, flourished Cornelius Agrippa, alchemist, astrologer, and magician, one of the greatest professors of hermetic philosophy that ever lived. He had all the spirits of the air and demons of the earth under his command. Paulus Jovius says "that the devil, in the shape of a large black dog, attended Agrippa wherever he went." Thomas Nash says that "at the request of Lord Surrey, Erasmus, and other learned men, Agrippa called up from the grave several of the great philosophers of antiquity; among others, Tully, whom he caused to redeliver his celebrated oration for Roscius." To please the Emperor, Charles the V., he summoned King David and King Solomon from the tomb, and the emperor conversed with them long upon the science of government. This was a glorious exhibition of spiritual power, compared with the insignificant manifestations of the present day.

I will pass over the celebrated Paracelsus, for the purpose of making allusion to an Englishman, with whose veracious history every one ought to make himself acquainted. In the sixteenth century, Doctor Dee made such progress in the "Talmudic Mysteries," that he acquired ample power to hold familiar converse with spirits and angels, and to learn from them all the secrets of the universe. On one occasion, the angel Uriel gave him a black crystal, of a convex form, which he had only to gaze upon intently, and by a strong effort of the will, he could summon any spirit he wished to reveal to him the secrets of futurity. Dee, in his veracious Diary, says, that one day, while he was sitting with Albertus Laski, a Polish nobleman, "there seemed to come out of the oratory a spiritual creature, like a pretty girl, of seven or nine years of age, attired on her head, with her hair rolled up before, and hanging down behind; with a gown of silk of changeable red and green, and with a train. She seemed to play up and down, and seemed to go in and out behind the books, and as she seemed to go between them, the books displaced themselves and made way for her." This I call a spiritual manifestation of the most interesting and fascinating kind. Even the very books felt the fascinating influence of this "spiritual creature," for "they displaced themselves and made way for her." Edward Kelly, an Irishman, who was present, and who witnessed this beautiful apparition, verifies the Doctor's statement; therefore it would be unreasonable to doubt a story so well attested. Doctor Dee was the distinguished favorite of Kings and Queens—a proof that spiritual science was held in high repute in the good old days of Queen Elizabeth.

But, of all the professors of occult science, hermetic philosophy, or spiritualism, the Rosicrucians were the most exalted and refined. With them the possession of the philosopher's stone was to be the means of health and happiness; an instrument by which man could command the services of superior beings, control the elements, defy the obstructions of time and space, and acquire the most intimate knowledge of all the secrets of the universe. These were objects worth struggling for. The refined Rosicrucians were utterly disgusted with the coarse, gross, sensual spirits who had been in communion with man previous to their day; so they decreed the annihilation of them all, and substituted in their stead a race of mild, beautiful, and beneficent beings. The spirits of the olden time were a malignant race; and took especial delight in doing mischief; but the new generation is mild and benignant. These spirits, as this petition attests, indulge in the most innocent amusements and harmless recreations, such as sliding, raising and "tipping" tables, producing pleasant sounds and variegated lights, and sometimes curing diseases which were previously considered incurable; and, for the existence of this simple and benignant race, our petitioners are indebted to the brethren of the Rosie Cross.

Among the modern professors of spiritualism, Cagliostro was the most justly celebrated. In Paris his saloons were thronged with the rich and noble. To old ladies he sold immortality, to young ones he sold beauty that would endure for centuries; and his charming countess gained immense wealth by granting attendant "symples" to such ladies as were rich enough to pay for their services. "The Biographic des Contemporains," a work which our present mediums ought to consult with care, says, "There was hardly a fine lady in Paris who would not sup with the shade of Lucretius in the apartments of Cagliostro; there was not a military officer who would not discuss the art of war with Alexander, Hannibal, or Cæsar; or an advocate or counsellor who would not argue legal points with the ghost of Cicero." These were spiritual manifestations worth paying for; and all our present degenerate mediums would have to hide their diminished heads in the presence of Cagliostro. It would be a curious inquiry to follow this "occult science" through all its phases of mineral magnetism, animal magnetism, mesmerism, &c., until we reach the present latest and lowest phase of all "spiritual manifestation." But I have said enough to show the truth of Burke's beautiful aphorism, "The credulity of dupes is as inexhaustible as the invention of knaves."

Mr. WELLER. What does the Senator propose to do with the petition?

Mr. PETTIT. Let it be referred to the three thousand clergymen. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHIELDS. I present the petition.

Mr. SUMNER. To what committee is it to be referred?

Mr. WELLER. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHIELDS. I am willing to agree to that reference.

Mr. WELLER. It may be that we may have occasion to enter into diplomatic relations with these spirits. [Laughter.] If so, it is a proper subject for the consideration of that committee. It may be necessary to ascertain whether or not Americans, when they leave this world, lose their citizenship. It may be expedient that all these grave questions should be considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I am an humble member. I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. MASON. I really think it has been made manifest by the honorable Senator who has presented the petition, that he has gone further into the subject than any of us, and that his capacity to elucidate it, is greater than that of any other Senator; I would, therefore, suggest to him that it should either go to a select committee on his motion, or be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he is chairman. Certainly the Committee on Foreign Relations have nothing to do with it. Perhaps it would be better to allow the petition to lie on the table.

Mr. SHIELDS. This is an important subject, and should not be sneered away in this manner. [Laughter.] I was willing to agree to the motion of the honorable Senator from California; but I do not wish to send the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations, unless the chairman of that committee is perfectly satisfied that he can do the subject justice. I had thought of proposing to refer the matter to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because there may be a possibility of establishing a spiritual telegraph between the material and the spiritual world.

Mr. MASON. I move that the petition lie upon the table.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am willing to allow it to lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to; and the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, so much of the President's annual message as related to the judiciary system of the United States, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The report of the Attorney General, upon the same subject, was also referred to that committee. We have given the investigation of the subject unusual care and attention; and the bill, which I am directed to report from the committee, comes to the Senate under very high sanction. It embodies, I believe, the essential suggestions contained in the report of the Attorney General, and I may say is passing, that although the judges of the Supreme Court act under a pretty correct method and system, the bill I present will receive their approbation. I ask, as the bill is one of great practical importance, that it may be made the special order of the day for the first Monday in May, and that the report which accompanies the bill be printed.

The bill was read a first and second time, and made the special order of the day for the first Monday in May.

The report was ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN GREY AND OTHERS.

Mr. PETTIT. I have an adverse report to make from the Committee on Private Land Claims, in reference to the claim of the heirs of Captain Grey and others, to land upon the northwest coast of America. I will detain the Senate but a moment in explaining the reasons for the report of the committee, as, it seemed to us, the papers ought to be referred to another committee.

The memorial on which this report is made, prays for two things. It alleges that these explorers were the first visitors upon the northwestern coast, that they purchased large tracts of country from the chiefs of the native tribes there, and that their purchases were very extensive. They ask a confirmation by Congress of their title to these purchases; but in the event—and they ask in the alternative—of the confirmation not being granted, they pray for a pecuniary consideration or reward for their trouble, vexation, &c.

The Committee on Private Land Claims have directed me to report adversely as to the confirmation of land, so far as the petition goes on that subject. The committee regard it as being very clear that they could not have bought of the natives. The parties admit that they took possession in the name of the United States—that they raised the flag of the United States. The committee, therefore, conclude that they must have acknowledged themselves as necessarily coming within the policy and laws of the United States, which forbid them to buy, individually, of any tribe. I am, therefore, directed to make a report on that subject, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the question, not expressing any opinion, however, as to whether the Government ought or ought not to make the parties a pecuniary consideration; but if it ought, it is clear that the matter should go to the Committee on Claims, and not to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I, therefore, move that the report be printed, that the Committee on Private Land Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SCHOOL LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives "to authorize the school commissioners of the fractional township No. 1, range No. 10 east, in Alabama, to locate one half section of land for school purposes," have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. As the bill is one to which there can be no objection whatever, and as there is an anxiety prevailing among those interested for its passage, I move that it be now taken up and considered.

Mr. CLAY. I trust the motion of the honorable Senator from Iowa will prevail. If I recollect the facts of the case correctly, the sixteenth section of land in the township mentioned in the bill, (for the failure of which it is intended to provide,) happened to be an Indian reservation, and the people of the township were thereby deprived of the benefit provided by the general act for the admission of the State of Alabama into the Union. By that act the sixteenth section in each township was granted to the inhabitants of the township for the benefit of common schools. The present bill, I believe, is intended to provide the citizens of the township named in it, with the benefits derived under the general act by the citizens of other townships. Hence, I trust it will be considered and passed immediately.

Mr. BROWN. This bill has passed the House, I believe.

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. I hope, therefore, it will be permitted to go over until to-morrow morning. There are some other cases of the same kind which I would like to have provided for.

Mr. CLAY. But I hope this bill will not be embarrassed by them.

Mr. BROWN. I will not embarrass this bill; but I should prefer that it go over until to-morrow morning.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill from the House of Representatives to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators, was read a first and second time.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and in doing so beg leave to call the attention of that committee especially to it, inasmuch as I introduced a bill of similar import on one of the earliest days of this session. I know that that committee have a great deal of labor upon their hands; but the bill is one which I conceive to be worth more to the Treasury, more to the country, than twenty homestead bills, and, perhaps, than all the bills in addition relating to the public lands which have been passed for twenty years. It has the great advantage of being founded in justice; and I do hope that the committee will find it convenient to act early upon it. I think it requires slight amendment. It is the first time, I believe, that the House of Representatives have passed a graduation bill. I repeat, I hope the committee will act upon it at an early day, so that we may have an opportunity of ascertaining the sense of the Senate in relation to it.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, was read twice by its title; and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to ask the Senate to take up the Pacific railroad bill, for the purpose of making it the special order for to-morrow week, at twelve and a half o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. It is a special order now.

Mr. GWIN. Then I desire to say that I will, to-morrow week, ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, April 17, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

THOMAS D. ELIOT, a Representative elect from the first congressional district of the State of Massachusetts, in the place of Zeno Scudder, resigned, appeared, and was qualified by taking the customary oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER stated that the question was on the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole

House on the State of the Union, on the Senate amendments to House bill No. 47, (the Military Academy bill,) shall cease in five minutes after its consideration is resumed, if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same; and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending or offered to the same, and then report it to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the previous question on that.

The previous question received a second; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

MARITIME RIGHTS—THE EUROPEAN SYSTEMS.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolutions. All I desire is, that they shall be read for information and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The resolutions were then read, as follows:

Resolutions of Congress declaratory of our maritime rights, and of our policy interdicting the extension of the European system of Government on any portion of this hemisphere.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States, as a maritime Power, having neutral rights to maintain, deem it proper, in view of the existing war in Europe, to declare and make known, that every American vessel engaged in the lawful pursuits of commerce, is held by this Government to be protected by the flag that covers her, and which shall be the evidence of her nationality; that we attach to all such vessels a character of sovereignty, considering them as clothed with immunities corresponding to those which appertain to our territory; that our rights, as thus declared, rest upon no precarious or temporary basis, nor upon the concessions of any power, but upon public law as insisted upon from the early history of the Republic; and that any attempt to enforce an obsolete right of impressment, search, detention, or visitation, in regard to such American ships, will be regarded as an act of hostility to the United States, and just cause of war.

Be it further resolved, That as the existing conflicts in Europe may lead to the change of political sovereignty in some of the European Powers, and the destruction of political sovereignty in others, we deem it proper for Congress to make known to them, that we affirm the doctrine, that we should consider any attempt on their part, to extend their system of government to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety, and from the geographical and commercial position of the Island of Cuba to this continent, we will never consent that her sovereignty be transferred, except to the United States, to whom she seems naturally to belong.

Mr. COX. I object to the introduction of the resolutions.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing them. All I ask is that they be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The yeas and nays were demanded, but not ordered.

The question was then put on Mr. WALBRIDGE's motion, and the Chair announced that it was carried in the negative.

Mr. COBB demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CLINGMAN and GREY were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes not counted.

Two thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

INCREASED COMPENSATION TO CLERKS.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back Senate bill No. 122, with a substitute therefor; and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report it at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read by its title, as follows:

An act to amend the third section of an act making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1854, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is only necessary for me to say at this time, that the object of the bill is to increase the compensation of the clerks and other persons employed in the Executive Departments of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having explained the object of the bill, if there is no objection, it will be received from the committee.

Mr. GREY. Is not this the day for resolutions?
The SPEAKER. It is not. Last Monday was the day set apart for calling the States for resolutions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed to the bill, and I object to its introduction. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] what disposition he now proposes to make of the bill?

Mr. ROBBINS. My intention is, if I am allowed to make the report, to move to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I object to its introduction at this time.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move that the rules be suspended, to enable me to introduce the bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Will it be in order to have the bill read?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I ask to have it read, that we may know what we are called to vote upon.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill, but was arrested by Mr. CLINGMAN, who said: I rise to a question of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe that before a matter is regularly before the House, the reading of a paper is not a question of right, but one of general consent, and if it be in my power to prevent its being read at this time, I will do so. I object to the reading, and raise that question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken, and sustains it. The bill is not before the House; and the question is, "Shall it be received?" The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has stated the character of the bill, and objection being made to its reading, the question must be decided by the House. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] still desire to have the bill read?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do, and I move that it be read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It will take a two-third vote, I believe, to order the bill to be read, because the regular order of business is different from the reading of this paper. For that reason it requires a two-third vote. The rule in regard to such matters has been so decided heretofore, upon my own exception to a ruling of Speaker Cobb, in a former Congress. There is a clause of the rule which says that a majority may decide whether a paper shall be read or not; and the House decided, during the last Congress, by a vote of yeas and nays, that that clause meant only such papers as were before the House, and that it required a two-third vote to order a paper to be read which was not before the House. If this bill had been reported by the consent of the House, a majority might order it to be read.

The SPEAKER. When a paper is before the House, any member may have it read. The rule says:

"When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House."

This is a paper in connection with the legitimate business of the House; and the Chair thinks it comes properly within the competency of the majority of the House to have it read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to call the attention of the Chair to a case similar to this, which occurred during the Congress before the last. The predecessor of the present Speaker [Mr. Cobb] decided that a majority had the right to have the paper read. I took an appeal, and the House, upon the yeas and nays, reversed the decision of the Chair, and decided that, upon a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution, the majority could not order the resolution to be read. The paper is not before the House. If it was, and a motion was made to read it a second time, it would then be for a majority to decide; but the case now before us does not come under that rule. I can turn to the precedent, if the Chair desires to see it.

The SPEAKER. The House is not considering whether they will pass the bill, it is true. If they were, any member would have the right to demand that it should be read. But the question is upon suspending the rule for the purpose of introducing the bill. The gentleman from Ohio asks that it may be read. The Chair has decided that a single member of the body has not the right to demand its reading. Objection being made, the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated the substance of the bill, which the Chair thinks sufficient for the House to base its action upon in determining whether it will receive it. If, however, the majority, for reasons sufficient to itself, determine that it shall be read, the Chair thinks they have the right to make the order. The Chair does not recollect any precedent upon which to base his action, but he thinks, under the rule, they have the right.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would suggest a case to the Chair. Suppose the House were pursuing the regular order of business, and I should ask that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury should be read, would the Chair hold that I would have the right to interrupt the business of the House for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. He would not. It could only be done by a suspension of the rules. In this case, however, the Chair thinks that the House have the right, in some form, to have the bill for the introduction of which a motion to suspend the rules has been made, read. He so decides; and the question is, "Shall the bill and substitute be read?"

The question was put; and the motion agreed to. The Clerk then read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That of the clerks authorized by the third section of the act approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four," those of the first class shall receive a salary of twelve hundred dollars per annum; those of the second class, a salary of fourteen hundred dollars per annum; those of the third class, a salary of sixteen hundred dollars per annum; and all vacancies in any of the classes, named in said act mentioned, shall be filled by promotion from the class next below; and all clerks not provided for in this act, performing the same or similar duties with any one of the classes, shall receive the same compensation as is allowed to such class; and the clerks employed in the Census Bureau shall be paid, during the present fiscal year, the same as is hereby allowed to clerks of the second class.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the stamp and blank agent for the Post Office Department receive the same salary as clerks of the second class, provided for in the first section of this act; and an addition of twenty per cent. is hereby added to the pay now authorized by law to each of the messengers, packers, laborers, and watchmen of the different Executive Departments of the Government in Washington; (to the clerks employed at the navy-yard and marine barracks, at Washington;) to the clerk, messenger, and laborer in the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings, doorkeeper and assistant doorkeeper at the Executive Mansion; public gardener, laborers employed in the public grounds and President's garden; two additional watchmen and the police at the Capitol; watchmen employed at the President's house and reservation number two, lamplighter, the general superintendent; the draw-keepers of the bridges across the Eastern Branch and Potomac; and that the provisions of the second section of the act of August thirty-first, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-three," &c., be, and is hereby, extended to such persons herein enumerated who were in employment during that fiscal year, and were excluded from the benefit of said act by the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That instead of the salaries now allowed by law to the Superintendent of the Census, and to the Assistant Postmasters General, they shall each receive the same salary that is paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the increased compensation provided for in this act shall commence from the first day of July, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and the necessary money to carry this act into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The following is the substitute proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means for the bill:

That the clerks of the first class, authorized by the third section of the act approved March 3, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," instead of the compensation therein provided for, shall receive a salary of $1,100 per annum.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the increased compensation provided for in this act shall commence on the 1st day of July, 1853, and for the payment of the same to the 30th day of June, 1854, the necessary money is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been demanded on the motion that the rules of the House be suspended for the purpose indicated.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LETCHER and DEAN were appointed.

The tellers reported—yeas 40, noes 83; more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DEAN. I desire, before voting, to understand the question. The question is whether we will receive the report, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules, to enable the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the report from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CLINGMAN. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania announces that his purpose is to put the bill on its passage.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Etheridge, Faulkner, Feunton, Fuller, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Hibbard, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Latham, Lilly, Lindsey, McDougall, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Phelps, Powell, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vansant, Wade, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Elisha B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Caske, Chastain, Clingman, Cox, Oulson, Dickinson, Drum, Edgerton, Giddings, Good, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Heister, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, McMullin, Murray, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pratt, Puryear, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Sage, Skelton, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—39.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, then reported back bill of the following title, with a substitute:

An act to amend the third section of an act making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1854.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to have this bill put upon its passage; and as it contains an appropriation, I move to suspend that rule which requires bills making appropriations to be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are some provisions in the bill which the House may desire to amend. For instance, it not only makes an appropriation, but it makes an appropriation to execute this bill as long as it stands on the statute-book.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order now to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order when the motion to suspend this rule has been disposed of.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If we can defeat this motion, the bill will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as a matter of course. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and there were—yeas 106, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Ashe, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Curtis, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, Etheridge, Faulkner, Feunton, Fuller, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Hibbard, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Latham, Lilly, Lindsey, McDougall, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maurice, Maxwell, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Phelps, Pringle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vansant, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Elisha B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, and Yates—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Caske, Chastain, Clingman, Cox, Drum, Edgerton, Giddings, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Heister, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, McMullin, in, Middleswarth, Murray, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pratt, Puryear, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Sage, Skelton, George W. Smyth, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, Wade, Wells, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—40.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rule was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. I merely wish to say to the House that the original bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. A majority of that committee have instructed me to report a substitute; and I only want to state that I am opposed to the substitute, and in favor of the original bill. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question. I will renew it.

[Loud cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the call for the previous question for one moment. I do not want to make a speech.

Mr. ROBBINS. I should like to gratify the gentlemen who wish to submit remarks in reference to this bill, but I must insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES. I do not wish to make a speech. I merely desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. ROBBINS. I must insist on my motion.

Mr. JONES. I am one of the committee who have reported the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to lay the bill on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. If the motion to lay the bill on the table does not prevail, will not the first question be on the substitute?

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN. And if the previous question is sustained?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a vote directly on the substitute, and then on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. And if the substitute is voted down, the question will then be on the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes, on the Senate bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. Well, I hope the Senate bill will pass.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw my motion to lay the bill on the table for the present.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order now to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not, for the reason that the previous question is demanded.

Mr. McMULLIN. I then desire to make an appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Robbins] to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ROBBINS. I should like to gratify the gentleman; but there are so many gentlemen around me insisting upon the previous question, that I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. PRATT. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 30, nays 115; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Caskey, Chastain, Clingman, Cox, Culom, Dick, Drum, Edgerton, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Letcher, McMullin, Murray, Parker, Pratt, Puryear, Ruffin, Skelton, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, and Wheeler—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Dickinson, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Giddings, Greenwood, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hinn, Hibbard, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Latham, Lilly, Lindley, Macdonald, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maurice, Maxwell, Mayall, Middleswarth, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Phelps, Powell, Pringle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vansant, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John

Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—115.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. ROBBINS. I now ask for a vote on the call for the previous question.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. Jones, of Pennsylvania, and Ashe, were appointed.

Upon seconding the demand for the previous question, the tellers reported—aye 66, noes 63.

So there was a second.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the House should refuse to order the main question to be now put, will it not be in order to offer amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER. If the House should refuse to order the main question to be now put, it will carry the bill over until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. That is a change from the practice which prevailed a year or two ago.

The question recurring upon ordering the main question to be put,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Banks, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Bridges, Carpenter, Chrisman, Clark, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hinn, Hibbard, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kurtz, Latham, Lindley, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Walbridge, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Ball, Belcher, Boyce, Caskey, Chastain, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Culom, John G. Davis, Dean, Dickinson, Drum, Edgerton, Edmunds, Giddings, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hester, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kidwell, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, Lilly, McMullin, Middleswarth, Murray, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Sage, Skelton, George W. Smyth, Stratton, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, Wade, Walley, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—63.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question first recurs upon the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McNAIR. I would inquire of the Chair if the vote is not directly upon the bill of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The House is brought first to a vote upon the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, which will now be read.

Mr. McNAIR. And then the vote will be upon the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. HIBBARD. I ask that the original bill and the substitute be read.

The Clerk then read the same, (as inserted previously.)

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the substitute reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, (inserted above,) and decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Appleton, David J. Bailey, Barry, Belcher, Bissell, Boyce, Caskey, Chastain, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Crocker, Culom, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Dickinson, Drum, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ellison, Fuller, Giddings, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Hester, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, Lilly, McMullin, Maurice, Middleswarth, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Phillips, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Sage, Seward, Skelton, George W. Smyth, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Vail, Wade, Wells, John Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Bliss, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Chrisman, Clark, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Thomas D. Eliot, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Goode, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hinn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Latham, Lindley, Macdonald, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Powell, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—82.

So the substitute was not adopted.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. WHEELER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Ashe, Barry, Belcher, Boyce, Caskey, Chastain, Clingman, Cox, Culom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Dickinson, Drum, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Fuller, Goode, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, Lilly, McMullin, Maurice, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Parker, Peck, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Sage, Seward, Skelton, George W. Smyth, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Vail, Wells, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Bridges, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chrisman, Clark, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hinn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Latham, Lindley, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Phelps, Powell, Pringle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Shannon, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Walbridge, Walker, Walley, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—84.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. DRUM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

[Here a message was received from the President of the United States, by his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he did approve and sign House bill No. 54, entitled "A bill for the relief of Madison Parton."]

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it competent now to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The main question has been ordered, and the question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I ask the previous question on that.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is now operating on the bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. WHEELER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is that motion now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order, for the reason that, since the last motion to lay on the table was acted on, the House has voted on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Have we not just taken a vote on laying the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. Since then a motion to adjourn has been made and voted on.

Mr. JONES. That does not alter the position of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a mere question of time. In the morning the House might not be willing to lay a bill on the table, but, without acting on the bill during the day, the House might be willing in the evening to lay it on the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. McMULLIN's motion; and it was decided in the negative. So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time.

Mr. CLINGMAN and Mr. ROBBINS both claimed the floor.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] addressed the Chair, he is entitled to the floor by courtesy.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to know if the previous question is exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is exhausted.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then, sir, I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has not got the floor to submit that motion.

Mr. ROBBINS. Can that motion be made while I have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had made a motion which he could not debate, and was not, therefore, entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor, on his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I would inquire if the gentleman from Tennessee voted in the affirmative?

Mr. CLINGMAN. There was no division.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does the gentleman from Tennessee say that he voted in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. As there was no division, any gentleman is entitled, according to the rules and practice of the House, to move to reconsider.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is not my intention to attempt to throw any obstacles in the way of the passage of this bill. I see that a majority of more than two to one is determined to pass it. But, sir, my object in making the motion to reconsider, is merely to state one objection to the bill which I am confident that a majority of the House would have remedied, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] had permitted me to point it out. I ask that the last clause of the bill may be read.

The fourth section was then read, as follows:

Be it further enacted, That the increase of compensation provided for in this act shall commence from the 1st day of July, 1853; and the necessary money to carry this act into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to have the last section of the substitute read.

Mr. JONES. The substitute has been voted down.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the substitute to the bill does not contain the same provision?

Mr. JONES. I think not. This bill provides for an increase of the salaries of the clerks employed by the Government in this city, of the first, second, and third classes, and who constitute nearly the entire force employed in the Executive Departments. Should it pass with that clause in it, a permanent and indefinite appropriation of money will thereby be made to pay the salaries of the clerks provided in this bill, so long as the act shall stand upon the statute-book. The Executive officers, the next year, when they come to submit estimates, will not present any as a basis of appropriation for the current year to pay these clerks, but they will take the money out of the Treasury under this appropriation for the next year, and from year to year, for a hundred or thousand years, should the law remain upon the statute-book that long. The bill provides for a permanent and indefinite appropriation; and it removes, in my opinion, all checks and guards upon the Executive officers touching the payment of these salaries. So important were the appropriations thought to be for a limited period, that the Constitution provides that no appropriation for the support and sustenance of the Army of the country shall be for more than two years. But here, by this proposition, you make an appropriation for the increase of these salaries for an indefinite period of time, unless there shall be future legislation altering or changing its provisions.

The provision which I wished to incorporate into the bill, before the previous question was sustained, was, that nothing in this act should be construed as appropriating money for a longer period than the current fiscal year, and requiring the salaries of these clerks to be estimated for and submitted to Congress at each session, as the salaries of the President, heads of Departments, and members of this House are estimated for and submitted at each session. I suppose the matter has gone so far now that, perhaps, the House will not reconsider the step they have taken; but if they will allow me to propose the amendment I have indicated, I shall not attempt to interfere with any other portion of the bill. I ask for the previous question upon the reconsideration.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his demand for the previous question for one moment. I promise to renew it.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to say only a word or two to the House in regard to this bill. It may be unpleasant to gentlemen who have made up their mind to vote for it to hear any remarks; but I do not think that the bill in all its features is thoroughly understood. I promise not to be tedious, as I desire only to make a few suggestions. The proposition now under consideration is a very important one, as it increases, by several hundred thousand dollars, the annual expenses of the Government; and I think that we may be likely to hurry it through without due examination, and without giving members an opportunity for that discussion and consideration which all bills making appropriations of money ought to receive. It is a bill which appropriates a large sum of money; but the principal effect is more objectionable than the waste of money even. We have lately got into great difficulty in regard to the subject of the appointment of clerks. It is well known that there is an immense rush here for offices. Every man here is pressed from time to time with applications from their constituents to get them situations in the different offices of the Government.

I believe that the action of Congress during the last session has contributed very much to produce this evil of which I speak. Everybody admits that the fact of there being so much office-seeking under the Government is a very serious vice. There is a very great desire to get into public offices, and there is a constantly increasing number of men who are seeking for them. The result is, that whenever we have a State or a presidential election there is an immense excitement in the country; and Congress ought not to legislate in any way that will tend to increase this mischief.

At the last session of Congress there was a proposition brought in to increase the salaries of the clerks. The eight-hundred-dollar clerks were raised up to a salary of one thousand dollars, and all classes of these employees were moved forward to a higher rate of compensation.

During the discussion upon that occasion I remember very well that an eloquent friend of mine [Mr. Gentry, of Tennessee] made a handsome plea in favor of the increase. He told us of a young man in the practice of law in his own State who came here and obtained a thousand-dollar clerkship. He brought his wife and family here, and he found that he could not conveniently sustain himself upon his salary. He presented the case very feelingly and ably, and the consequence was that the House went forward, and passed a bill for the increased compensation. The present bill raises the salaries of the lower class of clerks to $1,200 per annum; the second class to $1,400, and so on. It also gives back pay additional to the clerks that have already been in office, &c. It thus appears that there is a greater demand for an increased salary than before. Let us see how that is brought about. Here, for instance, is a young man practicing law in Tennessee. He is informed that men obtain at Washington what he regards as a high salary. He makes an application through his friends, obtains an appointment to an office in one of the Departments, and comes on here and enters upon the performance of its duties. He finds that his expenses are considerable; holds office for a few years, and then probably leaves it, or is turned out under an incoming Administration. In nineteen out of twenty such cases the individual goes home insolvent, or nearly so—a great many of them, perhaps, having contracted bad habits from their associations in Washington.

Now, if the public service required this, I would vote the money, and let the men be sacrificed, just as men are sacrificed in battle, or die by disease contracted upon the frontiers. But if the public service does not demand it, there is no just principle which requires that we should give it. The rule which an individual adopts for his government in like cases, is to give that sum which will secure a competent man to perform the duties which he desires. I know of no other principle which the Government should adopt for the guidance of its action.

If you want a mere copying clerk, any man who can keep a country school in your district or mine, or who would be employed as a merchant's clerk to keep books, is competent for that purpose. Such individuals are glad to get three or four hundred dollars a year in the country; and we have such individuals constantly coming to us to obtain employment in directing speeches and documents, or to seek places as messengers in the Departments, at that rate of pay. I remember a case which will, perhaps, illustrate the principle. I will state it. At the beginning of this session a lady came to me with a letter of introduction, who stated to me that she had a husband, who was a messenger in one of the Departments, and got thirty dollars per month; that his health was very bad, and that he was barely able to discharge his duties. He was not able to attend to any other sort of business when not performing office duty, and he had half a dozen children. She was very anxious to get one of her sons in here as a page in the House. I called upon the Doorkeeper of the House, who is a very polite and obliging man, and asked him to give this boy a place. He informed me that he could not, because several members of Congress had brought on young boys from the distant States for the purpose of getting these situations for them. The conclusion I came to was, that the pages are paid so well as to make it worth while to bring on these boys from the distant parts of the Union to get these appointments. Our pages receive two dollars a day, regular compensation. During the last session of Congress, by a two-third vote, but against mine, the House agreed to give the pages a sum in addition as an extra allowance, amounting to considerable more than their salary for the session, making their pay as much as four or five dollars a day; and the result is, as I stated, that boys are brought on from the remote States and secure places, while those in the city who need the pay as much are excluded. This is an abuse which I have constantly opposed, but unsuccessfully heretofore. In fact, at each session I am in a minority of less than one third, generous members giving away the public money to their favorites here.

I want to call the attention of the House to another fact. There are persons in the city who are glad to be employed as copying clerks at a dollar a day. But when you raise the salary of copying clerks to $1,000 a year, you throw these persons out of employment. And how? Why, as soon as the salaries are raised, and the fact becomes known abroad, young politicians from North Carolina, from Tennessee, and from the remote States, will come here and apply for the places. They are young men out of business, or, perhaps, a little above their business, and having political influence, they secure the situations; and those here in the city are displaced. This is the way the system works; while you take more and more from your Treasury, you get no better officers, but, in fact, worse ones.

Suppose you were to pay the workmen employed upon the wings of your Capitol ten dollars a day; the consequence would be that men would come on here from every quarter of the Union and apply for situations. Political influence would be brought into requisition, and the Superintendent would probably finally be obliged to distribute his workmen among the different States, as the cadets and midshipmen are now distributed. As it is now, the ordinary price is paid, and proper workmen are obtained, without any noise being made abroad in reference to it.

I know we are called upon to be liberal to these clerks, and I should be very glad to be so; I have friends from my section of country among them. But it is not our own money that we are voting away. We only act as the trustees of the people; and I am not going to vote to raise the compensation of these clerks still higher when hundreds of my constituents work quite as hard at home, and do not receive more than fifty or seventy-five cents a day for it. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, I should say to you, I am directed by one of my constituents to get some work done for him; I am his agent merely, or trustee; I can get it done for $100, but there is a good clever fellow who wants me to give him $200 as a favor to do it; and I should tell you, further, my constituent is a poor man but an honest one, and a hard worker, with a large family that he is trying to educate, and he finds it very difficult to get along and maintain them. You would at once tell me that, as an honest man, I had no right to give away $100 of his money merely to gratify one of my favorites; that I would act fraudulent as a trustee, if I were to spend his money thus. Suppose, sir, I should go to one of my constituents, who was plowing in his field, and say to him, Why do you not hire hands at seventy-five cents or a dollar per day, to help you tend more land and make a bigger crop? He will tell me, "I cannot afford to give anybody seventy-five cents per day. I cannot give fifty cents per day in cash to hire a hand. I am not, perhaps, clearing that amount myself." If I should say to him, "Now, my friend, you are taxed on your plow, on your salt, your sugar, the woolen goods you wear, or the blankets you buy to protect your family from the inclemency of the season. Are you willing to pay an additional tax; you who are making from fifty cents to seventy-five cents per day? Are you willing to pay an additional tax to enable some others to get more than four or five dollars per day, who are not working near as hard as you do?" He will tell me instantly, "No!" Have I the right to take that man's money who pays it for public purposes, for necessary expenses, and appropriate it to an uncalled for increase of salary, merely to gratify my favorites? The moment I go beyond the line of what is just and proper; the moment I determine to give a man more than his work is worth—for the value of every man is regulated by the demand for his services—I cannot say that I do what my duty calls for. If I employ a man to do my private work, and I pay him more than he gets from anybody else, I pay him well. The fact that you can get men to come forward and seek these offices, if you were to put them down to $500 or $600, is evident that they are doing better here, in their own opinion, than anywhere else.

The only rule for Congress to adopt is the one which I have laid down, and that is, to pay what is necessary to obtain competent men. I admit, for higher officers, your Commissioner of Pensions and others, who are required to understand the laws of the country, and ought to have judicial minds, you ought to pay more. The rule we have to adopt is to pay what will secure the necessary work. Do as any honest trustee would do with a trust fund. Where he has to spend any money for his trustors, he will spend only as much as will get the work done. If you, Mr. Speaker, and I were employed to have a house built for a man, we would not think it right to pay twice as much as we could get the work well done for merely to gratify those in our employ.

And I will beg, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen will bear one thing in mind. There has not been a single instance, during my time in Congress, where the emoluments of an office have been reduced. I do not speak of petty post offices. We reduced the salaries there, indirectly, by reducing the rates of postage. You will find that whenever you move a man forward—I do not care what office he fills—the result is that he stands where he is advanced. This matter of salaries is an advancing tide; it never recedes.

Again: You cannot satisfy the wants of these gentlemen. Suppose you raise the clerkships up to $8,000 per year, the amount now given cabinet officers. Well, the result will be that men who have been Governors in their own States, or Senators of the United States, understanding that they can get $8,000 per year, will come here, and such men will fill the clerkships. They will crowd out those individuals who would be glad to do the work at lower rates; and after they have held those offices ten years, they will petition, if they think that we will listen to their petitions. They will tell us that house rent is high; that they are bound to entertain their friends when they come here; that it costs a great deal to keep up carriages, and rent pews in fashionable churches, and that they must have an increase to $10,000 per year.

There is not a man in the country who is making money as fast as he wants to, and there is not a man holding office who gets as much as he would like to get; and if you will ask him whether he ought to have an advance, he will answer, "Yes, I can turn this money to a good account."

Gentlemen talk to me about liberality. I can very well understand the liberality of the man who puts his hand into his own pocket, and pays out his own money. I do not call it liberality to misuse the money of other people, and give it away to favorites. This money is raised by taxation. It is taken from an unwilling, reluctant community. They are willing to pay as much as we need, and nothing more. And I do not feel that I can, with any sort of propriety, insist on taxing my constituents, the majority of whom cannot make one dollar per day, to enable others to get a much larger sum, when we can secure the service for less.

I want to present these considerations to the House. I intend, at some time during this session, if I get the opportunity on one of the appropriation bills, to say something about the character of the public expenditures of the country. They vastly exceed those of any other country in the world. You may go to London, Paris, or any where else, and you will not find the public expenditures there like the amount paid for the same service here. I know that the rate of wages is higher in the United States, but it is no reason why we should pay ten times as much for the same service as others do, when we can get it for the half only.

This is a thankless duty which I am discharging, sir. We are surrounded by a constant pressure. It is a very popular thing to be generous, and vote the people's money out of the Treasury. If that money came into the Treasury just as the water comes into the Potomac, I should be glad to hand it about to everybody around us; but when I remember that it comes there by taxation upon the people, I do not feel at liberty to vote it away unnecessarily.

Sir, this Government of the United States is rapidly becoming the most extravagant in the world; in fact, it is the most extravagant for its service, and it will soon become the most profligate and wasteful, for it is the nature of all vices, growing out of expenditures to increase rapidly. Everybody knows that the decay of the Roman Republic arose from the fact, that in its latter days the public men gave away the money, lands, and other public property for votes to make themselves popular, and to be elected consuls and pro-consuls; but they were in the habit of giving it to the soldiers, and there was, therefore, some excuse for it; they said these men had defended the country. We, however, are making ourselves popular by voting money and lands to men engaged in the civil service, or who have performed no service at all. The result is that things are moving on at railroad speed. We are constantly increasing our expenditures with less service. It is a notorious fact that we do not get better service now, in the Departments, than we got twenty or thirty years ago when we did not spend one half as much. I beg gentlemen to look at this matter. If you will put down these expenses to the lowest rate that will pay and secure competent men, that is all they have a right to expect you to do. When you have done that, you will not have this great pressure for office; you will not have the whole country seeking office and this perpetual struggle in politics. You will get the work well done, and remember too, that by tempting these men to quit their usual business and come on here to seek office, you do them a great deal more mischief than good.

I have made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, merely to indicate the grounds of my opposition to this bill. I should like to gratify these clerks, and pages, and others, by voting them money; but I do not feel that I can do it with justice to my constituents. I would much rather avoid making this opposition. I would much rather that some other gentleman should come out and present the points of objection to these measures. I think this bill ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be discussed there, as all money bills should be discussed. If its principles will stand discussion, then let it pass, and I will acquiesce in it. I do not believe they will stand discussion. I do not believe there is a congressional district in the Union where these expenditures, which we are making all from good feeling, and to gratify persons around us, would be justified by the people; because it can be shown that you do not benefit the donees at all, taking them as a class; you may benefit an individual here and there, but you do more mischief than good to them as a class. I hope this matter will be well understood by the people, and that each gentleman who votes for the bill may have to justify his vote before the people. If so, I do not think the next Congress will press through such a bill as this without discussion, and under the gag of the previous question, as they are determined to do this, if they can. I consider myself fortunate in getting this opportunity to put in a few words; and I promise that this shall not be the last that gentlemen are to hear from me on this question; for I mean that the country shall understand it fully.

I now, in accordance with my agreement with the gentleman from Tennessee, demand the previous question. I hope that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, there to be considered upon its merits.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BRIDGES. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ENGLISH. Before the question is taken, I desire that the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth lines of the first section of the bill may be read. I think they contain a principle which has not been noticed by the House.

The SPEAKER. That portion of the bill will be read, unless objected to.

No objection being made, the Clerk read the passage indicated, as follows:

"A salary of $1,600 per annum; and all vacancies in any of the classes named in said act mentioned shall be filled by promotion from the class next below."

Mr. ENGLISH. The effect of that provision is to exclude all those not already in the Departments.

Mr. CORB. Read the rest of the clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And all clerks not provided for in this act, performing the same or similar duties with any one of the classes, shall receive the same compensation as is allowed such classes."

A MEMBER. That is bad too.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. Is the question now upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee? [Mr. JONES.]

The SPEAKER. The question pending is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken upon the motion; and, on a division, there were—ayes 44, noes 80. So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Ball, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Bliss, Bridges, Carpenter, Chrisman, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. 33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 59.

Tweed, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Wells, Wheeler, and Zoll-coffer—75.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it not first upon seconding the demand for the previous question?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is that question open for debate?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. ROBBINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn, in order that the bill may be printed, and we may have an opportunity of examining it.

The question was then taken on Mr. LETCHER's motion; and, a division being had, there were—ayes 65, noes 62.

Mr. COBB. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for tellers upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I desire to know in what condition the bill will be left, if the House now adjourn?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The previous question has been seconded.

Mr. ROBBINS. If it has been, all will be right.

Mr. DEAN. The previous question was not seconded. Only one side of the question has been counted.

The SPEAKER. A motion to reconsider is pending, and the question of reconsideration will bring the bill up at any time.

The question was then taken upon the demand for tellers; and they were not ordered.

The Chair then announced the result upon the motion to adjourn as being—ayes 66, noes 62.

The House accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty minutes) adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 18, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. President, I have been requested to present the memorial of the American Statistical Association, praying that a copy of the documents printed by order of Congress may be furnished to them. This subject has already been referred to the Committee on the Library, and therefore I move that this memorial be referred to the same committee. I may say that the association which makes this request is a very important one, has done a good deal for the promotion of statistical science, and has rendered important services to the Census Department of this Government, in preparing their recent report. I hope, therefore, that the prayer of the memorial may be favorably considered by the Committee on the Library. I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to erect a new post office building at Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a remonstrance of citizens of Pennsylvania, against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a memorial of the members of the faculty of Pennsylvania College, praying for a grant of land in favor of the chartered colleges of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the memorial of Gideon Prior, a soldier of the revolutionary war, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of Norristown, Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, and resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, held in the town hall, at Chester, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to establish territorial governments in Nebraska and Kansas; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying the establishment of a daily mail route from Kinzer's post office to the village of Intercourse; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of the heirs-at-law and descendants of officers of the Army of the Revolution, who served to the end of the war, praying that they be allowed the half pay for life promised those officers, and that the value of the commutation received by them be deducted from that allowance; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a remonstrance of citizens of Philadelphia against the passage by Congress of any bill which will permit the introduction of slavery into the Territory of Nebraska, or in anywise infringe upon the eighth section of the Missouri compromise act; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MALLORY. I present the petition of Adèle Sands, widow of Major R. M. Sands, late of the Army of the United States, asking for an increase of pension. I will say, in regard to this petition, that it is one which appeals strongly to the sympathies of the Committee on Military Affairs; and it comes within the precedents established by the acts granting pensions to the widows of Major Dade and Major Gardiner. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Also, the petition of Margaret Chandler, mother of the late Walter S. Chandler, second lieutenant of second regiment of United States Artillery, who was drowned while in the discharge of his duty, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Ludlow, Vermont, praying that no appropriation be made to pay for the negroes captured in the schooner Amistad, and set at liberty by order of the United States Supreme Court; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RELIGIOUS PRIVILEGES ABROAD.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, it affords me much pleasure to present a petition from a number of American citizens of the Hebrew faith, who desire to unite with their Christian fellow-citizens in asking the interposition of the Government to secure to all our countrymen abroad the rights of religious worship. This union, in order to promote the accomplishment of this great object, is a happy illustration of the spirit of equality and toleration which marks our institutions. Persecuted for centuries with bitter hostility, subjected to a tyranny, civil and religious, more oppressive than that endured by any other people, driven from the promised land granted to their forefathers, the separate existence to this day of the children of Israel is a perpetual miracle, establishing the truth of their history as well as of our religion, foretold, as it was, in the earliest period, and seen, as it still is, in the latest. In their migrations they have at length reached a continent, unknown to the patriarchs, by whose rivers they may sit down without weeping, to change the language of their Psalmist, even when remembering Zion, and where the law secures equal rights to all, be they Jew or Gentile. Exposed as the members of this persuasion yet are, in portions of Europe and America, both Protestant and Catholic, to the most illiberal prejudices, and to religious disabilities, the position of our citizens abroad who belong to it has peculiar claims to the consideration and interposition of the Government. Besides their legal right to equal protection, there is no portion of our population whose peaceable and law-abiding conduct better proves than theirs does, that they are well entitled to all the privileges secured to every American by our system of Government. I repeat, sir, I am gratified that they are taking part in this great movement, and I trust that ere long, they as well as all our other citizens, sent by the accidents of life to foreign countries, may receive the benefits of it. I present this petition and another of similar import; and I move that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

They were so referred.

PAPER WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Brown be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Francois Cousin, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Evans and others, praying indemnity for losses occasioned by the operations of the American army in Florida, in 1814, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill further to carry into effect the provisions of the ninth article of the Florida treaty, with respect to certain losses of Spanish subjects in West Florida; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Eliza M. Evans, praying to be allowed interest on a sum of money advanced by her father, Colonel Anthony Walton White, deceased, for the use of a regiment commanded by him during the revolutionary war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred papers in relation to the claim of Isaac C. Thompson, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac C. Thompson, the only surviving child and legal representative of William Thompson, deceased, formerly a brigadier general in the Army of the Revolution; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill making provision to compensate agents for paying pensions, and prescribing the time and manner of settling their accounts; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred documents in support of the claim of Sarah Crandall, widow of James Coon, to a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Rhoda Lewis, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Anne Royall, widow of Captain William Royall, of the Revolutionary Army, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Sophia Kirby, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

PERCUSSION ARMS TO THE STATES.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the law, that such States as shall desire, be allowed to return to the United States the whole, or any portion, of the flint lock small arms now in their possession, and previously issued by the General Government, under the act of April 28, 1808; and that the value of said arms, according to the standard at the time of their issue, be furnished said States in percussion muskets and rifles, originally manufactured as such by the United States, at their armories, or in such other ordnance or ordnance stores as shall be designated by the Governors of said States respectively, or their authorized agents: Provided, That all arms returned as aforesaid shall appear in good condition; and all expenses of transportation shall be paid by the States so making the change as aforesaid, respectively.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to revive, for a limited time, an act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a marine hospital at Dubuque, Iowa.

BURLINGTON UNIVERSITY.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill for the relief of the Burlington University, in Iowa. It is a bill to which there can be no objection, and I ask the Senate to put it upon its passage now.

The bill was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to grant to the Burlington University, in the State of Iowa, the lot or parcel of land in the city of Burlington, lying west of lot 978, between Market and Valley streets, which was set apart as a burying-ground, under the provisions of the acts of July 2, 1836, and March 3, 1837, with a proviso that this grant is to operate only as a relinquishment of the right of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill from the House of Representatives, granting a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to actual settlers.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, to the details of the bill now under consideration I have given no attention, but its principles meet the full approbation of my head and my heart. Of my head because, in my judgment, it will give to the country strength and defense, which will serve in the place of fortifications and standing armies. Of my heart, because it is an act of justice. Of my head, because it does that wisest of all things in a country, it couples patriotism with an interest, and makes it more ardent, available, and enduring. Of my heart, because it will give a house to the homeless and a home to the homeless.

The people of a country form its institutions, and its institutions, in turn, form the character of the people. People, institutions, and country are so nearly allied that they must mutually mould and sustain each other, for separately they will fall and decay.

Institutions should create and encourage love of country, and willingness to suffer in its defense; for, without this, institutions will fall into weakness, disrepute, and degeneracy, from which tyranny cannot rescue, nor severity save.

Mr. President, in all ages of the world there has been a longing, aching, and earnest desire in men to own and individualize the ownership of the soil; and for the promise, possession, and enjoyment of this, they have and will endure patiently more hardships, more fatigue, more suffering, and show more patriotism, than for all other earthly things put together.

In undertaking so wide and radical a change of our past policy, and adopting a new one with us, that is to effect so materially a large portion of our fellow-citizens, it is both prudent and proper to pause, and inquire whether other countries have adopted this, or a similar policy, and what its results have been. This is a legitimate inquiry. From the past, under like circumstances, we may safely reason what the future will be. The first instance of the adoption of a similar policy was in Egypt, long anterior to the Mosaic period, given by Diodorus Siculus, in Book I, chapter 6, in which he says that, anciently, the lands were divided into three parts, the first to the priests, the second to the king, and the third to the soldiers or people.

I disapprove of the first and second divisions, but the third commends itself to my approbation as well for its wisdom as its justice.

Hear what the historian says as to the last division:

"The last portion belongs to the soldiers who, at a word, are ready at the King's commands, for every expedition; that they who venture their lives in the wars, being endeared to their country by that plentiful share and proportion allotted them, may more cheerfully undergo the hazards of war. For it would be an irrational thing to intrust the safety and preservation of the whole, with them who have nothing in their country that is dear or valuable to them to fight for. And the chief reason why so large a share is allotted to them, is that they might more readily marry, and by that means make the nation more populous, and so there might be no need of foreign aids and assistances."

A wise policy in a nut-shell, and well expressed. To the soldiers were given one third of all the lands of Egypt, that they might at all times be ready and willing to defend the country, and might the more readily marry and take the responsibility of a family, and thereby increase the population and strength of the country, so that "there might be no need of foreign aids and assistances."

This was in the country where civilization and science were first known, and where regular government was first established among men, and all these continued to prosper and flourish until this wholesome policy was abandoned.

The next instance in which I find this adopted as a national policy, was among the Jews. Moses, that wisest of secular law-givers, fourteen hundred and ninety years before Christ, led the children of Israel out of that bondage in which they and their ancestors had been for four hundred years, and starting them on their weary and perilous journey of forty years through a wilderness, it became necessary to hold out to them some inducement or promise of reward to act, as a stimulant of the highest order, to buoy them up, and sustain them against the depressing consequences of such a journey, with all its trials, fatigues, dangers, disappointments, and wretchedness. Moses had made known to the Jews all the moral law and will of God; and had held Him up amidst his attributes, in all His perfection and beauty of holiness. He had promised them God's enduring favor and protection on earth, and their final reward of happiness in heaven. Yet there was mutiny in the camp. They murmured, complained, repented that they had started on their journey, and loudly clamored to return to the bondage and "flesh-pots of Egypt." Something yet remained to be done to restore order and give confidence. Amidst the thunders of Sinai another revelation was made, and another law was given. What was that revelation? What was that law? That the land of Canaan should be divided among the Israelites, that they should individually own it, and that "the land should not be sold forever."—[Leviticus, chapter 25, verse 23.]

This produced the desired effect. Discontent, murmurings, and longings after the "flesh-pots of Egypt" ceased, and in their stead they had patience, fortitude, and endurance to the end of their journey, thus proving, Mr. President, that men will do more and suffer more for the promise and possession of lands, than for the love or the fear of God. It may well be doubted whether anything could have induced that people to perform that journey, undergoing its fatigues, privations, and wretchedness, but this promise that they should own the land, and that it should not be sold forever.

Thirty-eight years after that promise was made and that law was given, that is one thousand four hundred and fifty-two years before Christ, when Moses was about to take leave of and bid his followers farewell, he called them all together, and having set down all the names and heads of families, he said, "Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance according to the number of names."—[Numbers, chapter 26, verse 53.] At this time and place Moses delivered his farewell address and gave to the Jews a secular form of government; both of which will be found in the fourth book of the Antiquities of the Jews, by Josephus. And if this address is not the original of, or the model from which Washington formed his immortal address to his countrymen, it will well repay the curious for the labor of reading it to see how similar they are in many respects, and satisfy all that Washington had a predecessor.

This great Hebrew law giver, in the most impressive manner, enjoined upon his followers the observance of his policy and laws; and promised them that so long as they maintained and observed this policy and these laws, they should be prosperous, happy, and prevail over their enemies.

Eight years later, that is one thousand four hundred and forty-four years before Christ, Joshua having exterminated the ancient Canaanites, and fully possessed their country, divided the lands among the families as had been commanded by Moses; thus consummating the promise that had been made to the Jews more than forty years before, and for the accomplishment of which they had born with unparalleled patience and fortitude, indescribable privations and sufferings.

Thus had the Jews, under the stimulant of a promise that they should be the owners of lands, performed this journey, expelled and exterminated a more numerous and powerful nation than themselves, with "cities great and fenced up to heaven."—[Deuteronomy, chapter 9, verse 1.]

Mr. President, so long as this people kept these laws and observed this policy, they constantly progressed in power and greatness, and bid defiance to all the surrounding barbarous nations, though many times more numerous and powerful than they. But so soon as they ceased to observe this policy and these laws, and allowed their lands to be absorbed by the few, (the common soldier having nothing to fight for,) they became a prey to surrounding nations, their homes were desolated, and their people became captives in foreign lands.

I call the history of Sparta to the notice of Senators. For many years the Spartans had been distracted and overcome by their enemies in every engagement, and reduced to abject weakness, till "Lycurgus, eight hundred and eighty-four years before Christ, destroyed all distinctions; and by making an equal division of the land of Laconia among the members of the Commonwealth, he banished luxury and encouraged the useful arts." Luxury was banished, and the useful arts were encouraged by the division of the lands. But this was not all; from that time the Spartans were united in a warm, burning, glowing, and ardent patriotism, and never met or suffered a reverse in war till the battle of Leuctra—a period of five hundred and twelve years. Here, then, may be seen in bold relief the direct effects and advantages of the ownership of lands by the mass of the people. Nor did this defeat happen till they had in substance abandoned the laws of Lycurgus. In my deliberate judgment $1,000,000 thus appropriated is worth more than $100,000,000 expended in fortifications and standing armies.

An instance in the history of Rome may be referred to.

After all the lands and wealth of that mighty empire had been absorbed into the hands of a few aristocratic patricians, enervated and effeminized by excessive luxury, idleness, and debauchery, and the plebeians were reduced to beggary and almost to starvation, and after the failure of the Gracchi and others to divide the lands among the masses, Rome was threatened, yes, was actually involved in war, and her very citadel reduced to imminent danger, and out of her immense population she could not raise troops to defend herself. Then the patricians appealed to the oppressed plebeians to rise, take arms, and defend their country; but the plebeians' reply was: "we have no country. Why should we shed our blood and give our lives for Rome when she gives us only misery and degradation?"

Here, Mr. President, is a glaring instance of national weakness from national injustice—from the want of coupling patriotism with an interest. If the lands had been divided among the masses, Rome would never have wanted soldiers or defenders.

Mr. President, the Egyptian and his laws have disappeared. The Jews forsook the law that was given them amidst the reverberation of the thunders of Sinai and fell. The Spartans suffered their lands to be absorbed by the few, and they were swept from the face of the earth. Rome pursued her course of oppression to the toiling masses, and nothing remains of her former greatness and grandeur but her decayed and decaying monuments, statues, and temples!

Mr. President, like causes will produce like effects. With what a warning voice do these historic reminiscences come to us? They are suggestive of words that would fill large volumes, but I will not enlarge or detain the Senate. Let us take heed and avoid the rock on which they split, by an early division of our public lands among those who will occupy and cultivate them; and thus you will avoid the answer of the plebeians to the patricians of Rome, and at all times have an army willing and efficient in time of need. Give to the country an army of land-owners and cultivators, and we may successfully bid defiance to the world in arms.

We have vast unoccupied and uncultivated tracts of lands, and they must remain so for long years to come unless we adopt this policy; and, as the lands are no longer needed as a source of revenue to the Government, let us make this wise disposition of them that has proved so advantageous to other countries.

And now, Mr. President, if I have not and cannot convince the judgments of Senators that this is a wise, prudent, and statesmanlike policy, let me appeal to their pity, justice, and humanity; and oh, that I had a thousand eloquent tongues to make that appeal with. Pass this bill, and hear the prayers and blessings of millions of honest hearts ascend to Heaven in your behalf.

Is there a Senator here who, if in his declining years should find one man surrounded by a family of children, who by the operation of this bill had been raised from poverty, want, and wretchedness to comfort, prosperity, and happiness, would not feel fully rewarded, and in his heart thank God that he had been instrumental in producing so happy a result, and that he had voted for so benign a law? Justice requires what wisdom dictates. Let it be done.

Mr. EVANS. I have the consent of the Senator [Mr. WALKER] who reported this bill to move that it be postponed until to-morrow, and at the same time to move that the bill which has been heretofore under consideration, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in regard to the claims of revolutionary officers, be taken up.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

SCHOOL LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CLAY. With the consent of the Senator from South Carolina, I desire to move to take up the bill which was laid over yesterday at the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] which, I presume, will incur no opposition, and which will excite no debate. It is the bill to authorize the school commissioners of fractional township No. 1, of range No. 10 east, in Alabama, to locate one half section of land for school purposes. It was laid over at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, not through any opposition to the measure itself, but with the view of amending it so as to provide for certain citizens of the same class in his own State. It is intended to authorize the inhabitants of certain townships in Alabama to locate other lands in lieu of the sixteenth section in those townships which had been reserved by Indian treaties for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. EVANS. I will waive my motion to take up the revolutionary claim bill, to permit the bill which the Senator mentions to be considered.

Mr. CLAY's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to direct the school commissioners of the fractional township mentioned, in the district of lands subject to sale at Lebanon, Alabama, to enter, free of charge, in lieu of lands to which they are entitled by any existing law, one half section any where in the township, with a view to the ultimate convenience of the citizens and the quality of the soil, for school purposes; and such selection is to be governed by the same rules, laws, and regulations as other reserved sixteenth sections in Alabama. They are to locate and report within two years to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, what lands they have located; and he is, upon the receipt of the report, to withdraw the land from sale, and the title is to be as valid as any of the sixteenth sections heretofore granted in the new States.

Mr. BROWN. I had intended to move an amendment to the bill. I asked its postponement yesterday for that purpose. My friend from Alabama objects to it, and thinks it would embarrass the bill, as the making of an amendment to it would take it back to the other House. I therefore forego that purpose, but give notice that I will introduce a separate bill to provide for like interests in Mississippi. The title of the bill I have not prepared.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill "to provide for the final settlement of the officers of the Revolutionary Army, and of the widows and orphan children of those who died in the service."

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to offer a proviso to one of the sections of the bill, which, I think the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. EVANS,] who reported the bill, and who deserves so much credit for reporting it, and stating it so ably, will agree to. It is that this act shall be construed to extend to surgeons' mates, who served to the end of the war.

Mr. EVANS. It can be done by amending the first section, which reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the officers of the Army of the Revolution, who were entitled to half pay for life under the resolutions of Congress, of the 21st of October, 1780, the 17th of January, 1781, the 8th of May, 1781, and the 8th of March, 1785, shall be entitled to receive the same, although such officer may have received, in lieu thereof, the commutation of full pay for five years, under the resolution of Congress, of the 22d of March, 1783."

—after the words "eighty-five," may be inserted the words "including assistant surgeons, or surgeons' mates, who shall be allowed the same as lieutenants."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS. I move to amend the bill further by adding, after the fifth section, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That in all cases where any officer received full pay under the act of 15th of May, 1828, or any other act of Congress granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the Army of the Revolution, one half the amount so received shall be deducted from the sum to which such officer, or his lineal descendants may be entitled under this act, and the time for which such officer's half pay shall be computed, shall cease at the time he receives such pension."

I desire to say that the object of the committee has been throughout, and the bill has been drawn with that single view, to do mere justice to these officers, and to give no one an advantage over another. Therefore, this clause contains this provision. In 1828 all surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army, by the act passed on the 15th of May, were to receive full pay for life. The act contains a provision that their half pay under this act shall cease at the time when their pensions commenced; but their pension was more than half pay; it was full pay; and this additional section merely provides, that whatsoever they receive over and above their half pay, shall be deducted from the sum to which they may be entitled. This is done with the view of putting the survivors on the same footing as deceased officers.

Mr. WALKER. I do not know that I properly understand the amendment of the honorable Senator from South Carolina; and I will ask him whether I understand it aright. If I do, it provides that from the time that the pensions under the act of 1828 commenced, the half pay shall cease.

Mr. EVANS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALKER. And in addition thereto, if an officer lived for any length of time afterwards, and received a pension, one half of the pension so received is to be deducted from the amount of half pay which he would have received up to the commencement of the pension.

Mr. EVANS. That is it.

Mr. WALKER. Well, sir, I cannot go for that proposition. I think that the withholding of the half pay of the revolutionary officers, or rather the commutation of it, inflicted sufficient injury upon them.

Mr. EVANS. If the Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, objects to the amendment, I will withdraw it.

Mr. WALKER. I think that it is better to do so.

Mr. EVANS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, this is a very important bill, and I must confess that I am not prepared to vote in favor of it; nor, I may say, to vote against it at present. All those who have known, historically or traditionally, anything of the events of the Revolution, must know that it was a period of suffering from its commencement to its termination. In fact, during the existence of that struggle, we had scarcely a Government. Our institutions were kept on almost by their own force. From the commencement to the termination of the Revolution, from year to year, there was a successive depreciation of the currency issued by the Government, whether in the shape of securities, or Continental money, or whatever it was. These were graduated, and the losses were imposed upon the community from time to time.

We all know that the amount of payment to the officers and soldiers was small; in fact, next to nothing. My own father was one of the officers of the Revolutionary Army, and I recollect perfectly, that when a boy, I heard him tell that he had given a month's pay for what was called a "yard" of tobacco in those days. That depreciation was the lot of all.

Now, my difficulty in regard to the matter is this: This matter was settled nearly half a century ago. I do not know how it comes before us. Have there been applications from any particular quarter for it? Then, if we begin a system of compensation which shall make the Government pay in one case, or one class of cases, the actual and nominal amount of its money issues, without reference to the scale of depreciation at which they were issued, why are we not called upon to pay off the old Continental money, dollar for dollar? Yet we all know that it is perfectly impossible to do any such thing; our revenue could not meet it at all. The losses of the Revolution did not fall upon individuals alone, but more or less upon the whole community; and it seems to me that we ought to understand thoroughly what we are doing. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, I know, has investigated the subject; and after his examinations, he has stated the amount of expense to which the bill will subject us as not exceeding $4,000,000. But, sir, every man who has attended to the operations of this Government for a series of years, must know how little dependence can be placed on such calculations. Let any man go back to the history of the pension laws, the heavy ones of which commenced about 1831, and he will observe what little connection there has been between the estimates and the actual expenditures under the pension laws. The expenditures have exceeded the estimates three or four or five times. This will be the case here. Judging from what has happened, we may well suppose that this will be so. Perhaps we have not sufficient materials on which to base a calculation. Whatever the circumstances were which led to the result, such, nevertheless, has been the fact under the pension laws.

I think I am in the same condition with a number of other gentlemen of the Senate on this subject; and I rose for the purpose of stating that I am not now prepared to vote on this bill. I want to do justice; but it seems to me that this bill will be either opening the door very partially, or will be opening a door for expenditures which it would be out of the power of this or any other Government to meet.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, when this bill was before the Senate, some days ago, I submitted what I supposed to be a fair statement of the amount in which it was likely to involve us in the way of expenditure. I now hold in my hand a letter from the Third Auditor, in which he says that the whole number of officers who have received the commutation, or half pay for life, amounts to two thousand two hundred and fifty-six. If you add to these the claims that have never been presented, forty-six more, it will make two thousand three hundred. The highest amount at which the officers of the Revolution have ever been estimated was two thousand four hundred and eighty; but it does not appear, from the books in the Treasury Department, that more than two thousand two hundred and fifty-six have ever received commutation, or half pay. Now, if you take the average number of officers at two thousand three hundred, and allow them (what I endeavored to show, and what I have no doubt is an over, rather than an under estimate) the half pay of a captain for twenty years, taking that as the average of their lives, the amount of expenditure will be what I before stated. In the books in relation to revolutionary claims that I have looked at, the officers are said to be of the age of "thirty and upwards." If they were of that age, I think we may fairly compute—and this is the largest computation that I have seen—the average of their lives at twenty years beyond the close of the war. Then the half pay of a captain, which would be about the average, and probably a little more than an average, of the half pay of all the officers, would be $2,400, deducting, as this bill proposes, the commutation which each has already received. Each officer, therefore, will, on the average, be entitled to receive $2,400 under this bill. Then, according to this calculation, the largest amount, supposing that the descendants of every officer of whom we have any record, come in, and receive under this bill, will be $5,520,000. But of this number, two thousand three hundred, what proportion is it likely will ever present their claims? In the first place, I think it a fair presumption, that in the time which has elapsed between the Revolution and this period, at least one fourth of those families have become extinct. To be sure, this is conjectural. We have no tables, no statistics, by which we can ascertain this matter with any great certainty. I beg leave, however, to state one or two facts in connection with it.

I had occasion some years ago to compare a list of the British peerage of 1756 with that of 1820, a period of about sixty years. From the comparison, it appeared that more than one half of the names which existed in the British peerage in 1756, had disappeared entirely before 1820. In a large number of cases the title had become extinct, and the families that owned them were no more; or it may have been (and no doubt it was in many cases the fact) that the title had come into the possession of female branches of the family, by whose marriage the name was changed. This is the only fact within my knowledge by which I have any means of ascertaining this point; but I think it a very fair calculation, from the information which I can obtain on the subject, that in the period which has elapsed from the Revolution to this time, at least one fourth of the revolutionary families have become extinct. Taking one fourth from two thousand three hundred, we have one thousand seven hundred and twenty-five as the probable number of the officers whose descendants will be entitled to relief under this bill.

Now, sir, suppose the descendants of every one of these one thousand seven hundred and twenty-five should apply, what sum will you have to provide for them under the bill? Only $4,140,000. But, is it likely that all will apply? Are the descendants of each one of the one thousand seven hundred and twenty-five, now in such a location that they can be easily identified? I have gone into some calculations upon this matter, and I will state my conclusions to the Senate.

By the act of 1828, a pension was granted to all the surviving officers and soldiers in the Revolution. In the returns from the Pension Office, this statement appears: that there were two thousand one hundred and seventy-three applications under that act, and that of this number only one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight were ever put upon the pension list. The rest were unable to make out their claims. I assume, therefore, that, although under the pension law of 1828, nearly half the applications were disallowed for want of proof, yet that one fourth the officers may now be fairly estimated as incapable of proving their cases under this bill. Their descendants are scattered from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. Then, taking off one fourth of this number, it will leave one thousand two hundred and forty-four. Multiply one thousand two hundred and forty-four by two thousand four hundred, and it will give you as the total amount necessary to be appropriated for the entire extinguishment of all the claims likely to come in under this bill, $2,985,600—a little less than $3,000,000.

This seems to be a large sum, but compare it with what you have done in other cases. We have now the largest pension list in the world, I believe, in proportion to the military force which we have employed in our wars. I find, in looking at the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, that we have now upon the pension rolls fifteen thousand persons, and we have been paying them since 1833, a period of twenty years, on an average $1,000,000 a year. In 1851, the estimate for pensions was $2,344,220. The actual payment for the last year was $1,876,072. That is the sum which we are now paying from year to year. Twice that sum will more than provide for all the claims which will be allowed under this act. If, therefore, we have dealt so liberally with those who are now living, who rendered services, why should we not make some adequate provision for the descendants of those who are dead?

There is another view of this question. We passed, the other day—and I believe that you, Mr. President, [Mr. Foot occupying the chair,] was the principal champion of it—a bill to give ten millions of acres for lunatic asylums in the States. I suppose that the value of that grant may be put down at $10,000,000. I find, on looking at the reports, that, for military services, we have given away twenty-four millions of acres of land, and that more than three fourths of this quantity has been granted to those who were engaged in the war of 1812, to those engaged in Indian warfare, and in the Florida and Mexican wars. I find, in addition to this, that we have granted away for railroad purposes six millions of acres. This makes a total of forty millions of acres of land which we have given away for the living; yet some gentlemen object to providing a small pittance for the descendants of those who are dead.

The honorable Senator from Michigan seems to think that this bill has been sprung upon the Senate in some irregular way. Now, sir, I find, in looking through the previous proceedings of Congress—for I know, personally, very little of what has been done here—that, in 1818, there was a report by Mr. Richard M. Johnson upon this subject. He reported a bill proposing to provide for these claims pretty much as this bill does. Again, in 1824 and 1828 there were similar bills reported. They, however, ultimately in granting pensions to the living, although the committees reported bills corresponding very much with the provisions of this, except that, instead of going back to the half pay, and charging the officer with what he received by way of commutation, they proposed to give him the amount of the commutation, with a deduction of one eighth from it, and to allow him interest also. That was done because, according to all the evidence, it appeared that the officers received actually only about one eighth of the amount of their commutation.

I have not looked much into the progress of the question from that time; and I do not find that there were any petitions presented from 1828 up to 1850. About that period, the petitions on which the bill is framed began to be presented. At the last Congress there were two or three. This year there are about fifty; and I am satisfied that next year there will be five hundred, and they will continue to multiply, until finally your table will be covered with them, and something will have to be done.

I have now stated, Mr. President, all the information which I have in relation to the subject; and I do not propose to discuss, what I suppose every Senator feels, the great propriety and justice of the claims which these people have upon us.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, I wish to make an additional observation at present, in reply to a seeming objection taken by the honorable Senator from Michigan to this bill. He seemed to liken it to that class of propositions which have been made here, to make good to the recipients the depreciation upon our revolutionary currency. He will observe upon examining the bill, that it does not partake of that quality at all; but the moving consideration of the bill was undoubtedly the depreciation of the revolutionary currency. The Senator must be aware that promises were made, under resolutions of Congress, of half pay for life to those officers who should serve to the end of the revolutionary war. That got up a clamor in the country that there was likely to be fastened upon it a pensioned class for life; and the proposition became very unpopular. It was then proposed, I think by General Washington in the first instance, that Congress should commute this half pay for life, to five years' full pay. In the resolution of Congress, commuting the half pay for life, it was not provided that the individual officers should be called upon to give their assent to it, but that it should be given by divisions.

Mr. CASS. By State lines.

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir, by the Continental lines of the several States. Agents were sent into the country, and this assent was obtained, either expressly or impliedly; but in whatever way the commutation was assented to, it was evidently the supposition of those whose half pay for life was thus to be commuted, that they were to receive the full amount of the commutation. Instead, however, of receiving it in money, commutation certificates were issued; and it is known, as part of the history of the country, that those certificates immediately became depreciated until they were worth at different periods, varying from eight to twelve per cent. only.

Now, this bill proposes to reinstate the parties, upon certain conditions, in their half pay for life; but it does not propose that the Government shall pay the commutation over again, for it provides that the nominal amount of the commutation shall be deducted in full, notwithstanding the depreciation from the amount of the half pay to which the officer would be entitled; consequently we are not making good the depreciation upon our certificates of that day, but we are restoring each officer to his rights under the promise of half pay, and then deducting the nominal amount of which he did get by way of commutation. The result will be this: If the life was a short one, the commutation will amount in reality to as much, and in fact to more than the half pay for life; and therefore, the descendants, in such cases, will get nothing, for when you come to make the deduction, there will be found to be a balance against the officer. But if the life was a good one, or a long one, if it ran on until the time when the half pay, according to the resolution of Congress, would amount to more than the full sum of the commutation, then the descendants will get the balance, after deducting the commutation. It will, therefore, be perceived by the Senator from Michigan, and by the Senate, that the provisions of this bill do not make good any depreciation whatever.

The Senator's recollection may serve him in remembering that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, two years ago, I believe, did bring forward a proposition to make up to the officers of the Revolution, the amount of the depreciation. That committee at this session, could not agree upon that proposition; but they deemed it wiser to report this bill; and after a very full and careful examination by the Senator from South Carolina, he reported the bill. I am satisfied that he has examined its provisions with great care, and that he has devoted much attention to the history of the period. I am satisfied, as I doubt not the other members of the committee are, that this bill, to say the very most of it, will do nothing more than legal justice to the officers of the Revolution. I for one should be truly gratified to see it passed.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin must not misunderstand me. I take no position against the bill, but as it had not been argued, I threw out the suggestions which occurred to me.

Mr. WALKER. I did not understand the Senator as opposing the bill, and I wished simply to answer the objections which he suggested.

Mr. CASS. The difficulty which occurs to me is precisely this: It is now proposed to reopen, under the Constitution, claims which have arisen from the bad faith, if you may give it that name, of the Government of the Revolution. Although it did all it could, it was incapable of carrying into effect the pledged faith of the Government. If you open that question in this case, I do not see why you should not reopen it in every other.

The men of the Revolution settled the claims of the Revolution. The question of commutation must have been settled sixty-five or seventy years ago, and at that period the parties received the commutation in full discharge of their claims on the Government. I cannot state precisely the circumstances, for I have not adverted to the matter for some time; but I know the facts traditionally. As the honorable Senator from Wisconsin very correctly says, there was a great prejudice against the proposition to continue life pensions, precisely as there was a prejudice against the Society of the Cincinnati. The hereditary nature of that society created such a prejudice against it that the society, in fact, became extinguished. That feature of it was abolished, and the society went on. There was a similar feeling against life pensions, and therefore there was a change. If I understand it, the change was not in all instances agreed to by individuals, but submitted to the lines of different States, and agreed to by them, and the commutations were then accepted by the individuals.

Now, there is no doubt that the Government was bound to pay the amount of the commutation. You may consider it, if you please, a breach of faith that it was not paid, but it was not paid, because the Government had no means with which to pay it. So it is a breach of faith that you did not pay the soldiers of the Revolution, who went barefooted and without clothes. They were supported throughout all that trying struggle by a principle of patriotism, the most glorious that the world has ever seen.

Now, then, I ask again, Mr. President, without saying how this bill ought to be determined, why select this particular instance of the incapacity of the Government to carry out its pledged faith? Why not carry the principle through, and look to all other cases, and provide for the soldiers as well as the officers of the Revolution. This is my difficulty, and it is the only difficulty I have about the bill. If there has been a want of faith on the part of the Government, or an incapability to fulfill its promises, and we are now able to fulfill them, let us do so.

Mr. SUMNER. And provide for the Continental money?

Mr. CASS. Certainly. Why not include the Continental money and various other matters? If, when the Government began issuing that currency, it considered each paper dollar issued as equal to a Spanish milled dollar, and at the end of the year there was a depreciation perhaps of fifty per centum, and it went on the succeeding year to seventy-five per centum, and so on until you can hardly count the rate of depreciation, why not go back and ascertain those scales of depreciation, and actually pay the face amount of that currency? We all know that there was a great loss upon that species of currency. Some of the younger portion of the Senate may suppose, perhaps, that it was funded like the other debts of the Government; but it is a mistake to suppose so. Not a dollar of it, not a cent of it, was ever funded. It died in the hands of the community. The soldiers were paid in it, but it went for nothing, and it died in their hands. I repeat, then, if you once begin to open that question with relation to the faith of the Revolutionary Government and the non-fulfillment of its obligations, let us examine the whole of it, and I do not see, myself, why you should select one case any more than another. Before that is done the whole subject ought to be much more maturely considered than it has been.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to look a little further into this matter, and I perceive indications on the part of those around me to do so; I therefore move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed, say for a week.

Mr. CASS. It would be better to say next week.

Mr. SEWARD. Next Wednesday.

Mr. EVANS. Suppose we say Monday.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator who has charge of the bill suggests Monday. I have no objection to that except this: I am informed that the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] desired, probably, to submit some views to the Senate on the subject, and I am told that he is detained from here by illness, and is not likely to return before the day which I have named. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow week.

Mr. EVANS. Very well.

Mr. CASS. The Senate have been good enough to say that they will hear my remarks upon another subject on Monday next. There is no particular pressure of business, I believe; but, if there is, I will give way.

Mr. SEWARD. It is better to say Wednesday next, the day which I have already named.

Mr. WALKER. Before the question is put on the motion to postpone, I wish to say, in reply to the question put by the honorable Senator from Michigan, that I think the answer to his question is a very plain one. The question he asks is, why not extend this principle to the soldiers as well as to the officers of the Revolution? The plain answer is, that the Government made a promise to the officers.

Mr. CASS. I see that the honorable Senator misunderstands me. I know perfectly well that the soldiers were not entitled to this pension, if it may be so called; but what I mean to say, is, why not ascertain the value of the pay given to the soldiers, and, if it turns out to be worth nothing, why not pay them again? I know they were not entitled to commutation, but every one knows that their pay was, in point of fact, nothing.

Mr. WALKER. I have no objection to going as far as the Senator from Michigan would go; but for our present purpose, the answer to the query of the Senator from Michigan is very plain. The Government promised half pay for life to the officers if they served to the end of the war. They did serve to the end of the war, and complied with the conditions on their part. Then, as it were, in violation of the contract, they were cut down in the amount promised them. They were tacitly forced to take a commutation of their half pay for life, in five years' full pay, and even that commutation was never paid. Now, we propose to comply with the promise of the Government to some extent. We cannot do it to the full extent; but we propose to comply with it as far as we can, and to make good the promise as far as it is in our power to do so.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Wednesday the 26th instant; and it was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. WELLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 18, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to inquire of the Chair what the first question is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill increasing the salaries of the clerks in the Executive Departments was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on yesterday; and the question is, "Shall the main question upon the motion to reconsider be now put?" the demand for the previous question having been seconded on yesterday.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it in order to make any remarks at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question was seconded yesterday, and the question is, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Would it be in order to have the bill now read?

Mr. DEAN. The original bill was read yesterday.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to have the bill read as a matter of right, upon the demand of a single member, but it is competent for a majority of the House to order the bill to be read.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. DEAN. I object. The bill is published in the Globe which is upon our desks, and every member can look at it for himself.

Mr. HENN. It will be much more intelligible if gentlemen will read it for themselves in the Globe. I also object.

Mr. SAGE. When the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time shall have been reconsidered, will it then be open for discussion?

The SPEAKER. If the House shall reconsider the vote, the bill will then be subject to commitment or to amendment, and will be open to discussion.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to ask the Chair one question. The gentleman from Tennessee indicated yesterday that he desired to offer an amendment. Now I want to know if, by unanimous consent, he cannot offer it without the necessity of taking all the backward steps which will be required in order to reach it regularly?

The SPEAKER. Certainly it will be competent for the House to amend the bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have no objection to the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I hope it may be allowed, by unanimous consent, to be offered.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed to the bill. I am willing that it should be thrown open for amendment and discussion. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday had the previous question ordered upon the bill without giving us an opportunity of saying one word upon it, and I am now unwilling that the gentleman should be allowed by unanimous consent to go back and make the modification which he desires, without giving others an opportunity for explanation. If the bill, by general consent, may be thrown open to discussion and amendment, I have no objection; but I am not willing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have the general consent to accomplish his own purposes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have no modification to propose, or desire for discussion. I only desired unanimous consent to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order, the previous question having been seconded. The question now is, "Shall the main question be now put upon the motion to reconsider?"

The question was taken; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question now being upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the vote was reconsidered.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was upon my motion. I stated, at the time of making it, that it was with a view of so amending the bill as to prevent it from making the appropriation for the salaries provided for in it permanent. I now propose to make that amendment. I move, therefore, to add at the end of the original bill the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to make an appropriation for any period beyond the 30th of June, 1854.

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have the power. I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES. It is not my purpose to go into an argument upon the merits of this bill. It is objectionable to me in its main features, and, for one, I cannot support it; but having proposed the amendment which I indicated to the House that I would, if the vote was reconsidered by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, I shall make no other motion in reference to the bill, but leave it in the hands of the House.

Mr. COBB. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to offer an amendment to the bill which I am sure will meet with the approval of the House. Members will think that it is right. I move to strike out the words:

"And all vacancies in any of the classes named in said act mentioned shall be filled by promotion from the next class below."

The effect of the amendment is to destroy the proposition that where a vacancy occurs in class number three, the highest office, it is bound to be filled by a clerk of class number two, when a number one is better qualified to discharge the duties than number two. If the amendment be adopted, promotion will be left to the discretion of the heads of the Departments. They will not be restricted in their action. If a number one is a more efficient clerk than a number two, they will be allowed to promote him. Now they cannot do so. Merit should be the stepping-stone to promotion; and if my proposition be adopted, it will be, under this bill. Heads of Departments have the right to make their appointments as they deem best. I doubt very much the propriety, or the right, of Congress to fix rules for these promotions; but I will not argue the question. It is so obvious that the appointing power should not be restricted by them, that I will content myself with submitting the question to the House without further remark. Hereafter I may suggest another amendment. I do not think it is proper for me to call for the previous question, and I will not do so.

The amendment was read by the Clerk.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, the motion which my colleague has made, to strike out that provision of the bill, is one which it seems to me the House will not hesitate to adopt. It is a new principle introduced into the legislation of Congress, so far as I am aware of it, that promotions of the civil list shall be made according to the rule and practice which has heretofore only obtained in the military service of the country. It is very evident that it is not the policy of the country to confine appointments to any particular class. It is against the spirit of our institutions, and it is against the proper exercise of the appointing power itself, that it shall be limited to any specific persons, or any specific class of persons.

But, sir, it seems to me that the objection goes a step further, and that the provision contained in this act, by which vacancies in the first class must be filled from the second class, is absolutely unconstitutional. The Constitution provides that Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, or in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. Now, it is perfectly well known that Congress itself cannot make the appointment. These two Houses of Congress could not by act appoint A, B, or C to any office in this Government. The appointing power is not in Congress, but to Congress is delegated the right to vest the appointment in the President alone, in the heads of Departments, or in the judges of the Supreme Court. Now, when Congress proceeds to exercise this constitutional power, by vesting the appointment in the President, or in the heads of Departments, it must vest the complete and entire power. As Congress itself cannot make the appointment, Congress cannot by act control the mode and the manner; it cannot confine and limit the appointing power to persons and classes. But the appointment and the appointing power must be regarded as a complete thing in itself.

Now, if it is competent for Congress by act to say to the President or Heads of Departments, in whom the act has vested the power, you shall confine your appointing power to the second class of clerks, why may it not, by the same process of reasoning, say, when a vacancy occurs in the first class, you shall give it to the oldest officer in the second class?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me to ask whether it would not be competent for us, if the view of the Constitution is right which he is combating, to provide in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill that all the valuable offices—say all those of which the salaries are more than $2,000—shall be filled by ex-members of Congress? It would be a fine thing; for legislation of that sort would make a great many ex-members of Congress, and we might provide for those gentlemen who are put out. [Laughter.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. It involves precisely the same idea. The whole matter amounts to this: that as the appointment itself cannot be made by Congress itself, so Congress cannot, by act, control the person to whom the appointing power is given, but to that person must be left the power of making the selection to fill vacancies.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I have no objection whatever to the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. Cobb,] and am perfectly willing to accept it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. PHILLIPS. My principal desire was to bring this question to the attention of the members of the House, because it seems to me to be so clear a principle that the mere statement of it would lead to no further argument on the subject.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the gentleman, that there may be no misunderstanding in regard to these amendments, the Chair begs leave to state that the only pending amendment is the one proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.] The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama being inconsistent with that, or not connected with it at all, is not pending as an amendment to an amendment; and the only amendment now before the body, is the one proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GROW. I desire to ask the Chair if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Robbins] did not accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has no right to accept it, as he is acting for the committee, and not for himself.

Mr. SAGE. I have an amendment which I desire to offer. I will not detain the House a single moment in explanation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The Speaker has ruled that no amendment is in order.

The SPEAKER. Except that proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.]

Mr. SAGE. I desire simply to state to the House, that I received a communication last evening from the clerks in the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York, calling my attention to this bill, and requesting me to use my influence to have a section incorporated into it, providing that its benefits should apply to them. I see no reason why we should not extend its provisions to them, as the expenses of living in that city are fully as high as they are here. At the proper time, I will move, therefore, to amend, by offering an additional section, providing for these employees of the Government at Brooklyn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Phillips] yield the floor?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I understood the Chair to say that no amendments were now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that no amendment was in order, unless it was an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] which reads as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as making an appropriation for any period beyond the 30th of June, 1854.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Having brought before the House the question to which I alluded, I will now take the occasion, while I am occupying the floor, to make a few additional remarks.

The principal reason urged for the passage of this bill is the increase in the expenses of living. I make the inquiry if this is a local result? Is the increased expense of living confined to the city of Washington; and is it here, alone, that the Government should provide for this change of circumstances? If such an increase in the expenses of living exists—and I do not deny it—is it not universal? Is there not the same increase in expenses in all the States—in my State as in yours, Mr. Speaker? Is it a local increase? If it is, as I state it to be, an increase of expenditure throughout the country, owing, probably, to an influx of a greater quantity of coin into the country, producing similar effects everywhere, why should the bill upon your table confine the increase of salaries to the clerks employed in this particular locality? Why is not this increase made in the salaries of clerks employed in the custom-houses and post offices in the city of Mobile and the city of New Orleans, where I know the expenses of living are greater than at Washington? If the evil exists which makes it necessary to act upon this subject for the clerks in this particular locality, then I say it is proper for the committee to take the whole subject into consideration, and do equal justice to the employees of the Government everywhere. If it were for nothing else than the principle of inequality contained in this bill, I should be opposed to it.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[Many Voices. "That is right!"]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, the bill is debatable under that motion?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SMITH. I propose to trouble the House with but a very few remarks upon this subject; but I shall be glad to have their attention, because I understand that the subject which has been under consideration is the power to appoint clerks from the first to the second, and from the second to the third classes, and so on.

Mr. COBB. That subject is not under discussion. The amendment was not entertained.

Mr. SMITH. Did not the gentleman from Alabama move an amendment reaching that point?

Mr. COBB. I did; but the Chair did not entertain the motion, because the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] was pending.

Mr. SMITH. If that is so, I have no remarks to offer now, and have no objection to the bill being sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Phillips,] I call for the previous question.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would suggest to the gentleman that he should modify his motion by moving that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH. The motion was made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Phillips,] I made no motion, but only called the previous question.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope we shall not do that. Let us refer the bill.

Mr. PECKHAM. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. WHEELER. As it is the wish of several members, I will withdraw my motion.

The question then recurring upon the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. SAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OLDS. I should like to know if discussion can be had now upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order, unless he rises to a point of order.

Mr. OLDS. I do rise to a point of order. It is that discussion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has long since decided that the discussions going on throughout the Hall are very disorderly.

Mr. OLDS. I so understood.

The SPEAKER. The House having determined that the main question shall be now put, cuts off all debate.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Barry, Belcher, Bugg, Caskie, Chingman, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Drum, Edgerton, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, English, Fuller, Goode, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Sampson, W. Harris, Hastings, Hayes, Hubbard, Hoester, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kirtledge, Letcher, Macdonald, Maurice, Middlesworth, Morgan, Murray, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, David Ritchie, Rufin, Sage, Seymour, Skelton, William Smith, George W. Smyth, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, Walley, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Barksdale, Bell, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Chandler, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Curtis, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Giddings, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley F. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Clancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Knox, Kurz, Latham, Lindley, Lindsay, McDougall, McKim, Mace, Macy, Mayall, Smith Miller, Olds, Phelps, Pringle, Richardson, Thos. Richey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Showers, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Wade, Walbridge, Warren, Elliott B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, Daniel W. Wright, and Yates—87.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Pending this call,

Mr. LILLY stated that he would have voted in the affirmative, but that he had paired off with Mr. DISNEY, of Ohio.

Mr. CLINGMAN also, pending the call, said: I rise to a question of order. I understood that when the name of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bayly] was called, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Benton] answered for him. He answered for General Bayly, supposing it was his own name, and there may be two votes.

A Voice. General Bayly would have voted the same way.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My friend from South Carolina says General Bayly would have voted the same way. I do not know how that is, for General Bayly is not in his seat; and in order to prevent mistake, I have raised the question, in order that this correction may be made now.

Mr. BENTON. I heard the name Thomas H. called, and supposing it was intended for my name, I answered to it.

The SPEAKER. The mistake will be corrected. Further debate is not in order. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose it will be in order now to speak upon this bill generally. I desire to call the attention of the House—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is obliged to interrupt the gentleman, as debate is not in order; the call for the previous question having been called and sustained by the House.

Mr. SMITH. Then the question comes up upon the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has already been ordered to be now put. The previous question as demanded by the gentleman from Virginia himself, [Mr. Smith,] sustained by the House, and the main question ordered to be put, first applies to the motion to commit. The House will then be brought to vote upon the pending amendment, and next upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. All further amendment, as well as debate, is cut off by the previous question.

Mr. COBB. Is my motion cut off too?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COBB. I am sure the House did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman must have been out of the House when the Chair explained that matter. The Chair rose, in order that there might be no mistake in regard to the course of proceeding upon the bill, and stated in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, that two amendments differing in their character so widely as did the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] and that of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] could not be entertained at the same time.

Mr. COBB. I will make an explanation when the Chair is through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated distinctly that he could entertain but one motion at a time, and did not entertain the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. COBB. Will it not be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was sustained, so as to enable me to get my amendment in?

The SPEAKER. That can be done.

Mr. COBB. I am satisfied that there are not three members of this House who are opposed to my amendment; and therefore I will move, at the proper time, to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was sustained.

The question was then put upon the amendment offered by Mr. Jones; and it was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to introduce the amendment which I before offered.

[Several MEMBERS. I object.]

Mr. COBB. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If that be reconsidered, then we shall have to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] was adopted, and the vote upon the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. For what reason, and upon what principle?

Mr. CLINGMAN. We shall have to reconsider the successive votes which have been taken in order to get back to that vote.

The SPEAKER. Wherefore?

Mr. CLINGMAN. If we are to go back of the vote by which the previous question was seconded, we must go through all the intermediate steps; we must reconsider all the votes that have been taken since the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The votes to which the gentleman refers were legitimate and proper, whether the previous question was operating or not, and are conclusive in their nature. The House have determined that they will not commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and by another vote they have determined that they will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, leaving the previous question operating alone upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and it is necessary to reconsider the votes by which the main question was ordered to be put, and by which the previous question was seconded alone, to make the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama in order; but—

Mr. COBB. I ask for the vote upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me to—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Alabama will allow the Chair to say, that unless better order is preserved in debate, it will be impossible to transact any business understandingly. The Chair could not hear one word that either the gentleman from Alabama or the gentleman from Pennsylvania said.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order to move to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means at this time?

The SPEAKER. Not while the previous question is resting upon the bill. That cuts off all motions to commit or to amend. The question pending is upon a motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was taken; and the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. COBB. I now submit my amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order now to submit any motion to amend, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. COBB. Is it necessary to reconsider that, too?

The SPEAKER. It is necessary to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, before any motion can be entertained. Unless that be done, under the rule the question must be now put upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. COBB. I then submit the motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

The question was taken; and the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. COBB. I now submit the amendment which I have before indicated, and, as I presume it is the wish of the House, I move the previous question.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to ask a question of the Chair, for it is impossible to understand what has been done and what has not. I wish to inquire whether the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] has been reported at the Clerk's desk, and whether the House has adopted it without ever hearing it read?

The SPEAKER. The amendment was reported to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not hear it at all. If it was reported, there was so much noise that it was impossible to hear it. I submit that it is impossible for us to get on understandingly in transacting any business while the House is in such a state of confusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states to the gentleman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee was reported twice at the Clerk's desk, and adopted by the House.

Mr. SAGE. I wish to inquire whether it will be in order, after the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama shall have been disposed of, to offer the amendment which I have before indicated?

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman would not be in order as an independent proposition. The Chair stated to the gentleman that it could not be received as an independent proposition; it would only be in order as an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. SAGE. Can I offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama offered his amendment, and demanded the previous question. Should the House second the previous question, and order the main question to be put, as a matter of course it would cut off all motions to amend or to commit from being made.

Mr. SAGE. I ask that my proposition may be read.

Mr. KERR. I desire also to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The proposition of Mr. SAGE was then read for information, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the compensation given to the clerks and employees in the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York, be increased twenty per cent.; and that said increase commence on the 1st day of July, 1853.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order now to submit a motion that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It will not. The gentleman from Alabama has submitted an amendment on which he calls for the previous question.

Mr. COBB. That being now understood I shall resume my seat.

Mr. DEAN. Before the call for the previous question is seconded, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is in order to move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to a day certain.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, and it will not be until the call for the previous question is voted down.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama has called for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has called for the previous question, and all motions and debate are now out of order.

Mr. WASHBURN. I hope that the call for the previous question will be seconded.

The question was put; and there were, on a division—ayes 60—

Mr. ROBBINS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and PRATT, were appointed.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative, the tellers having reported—ayes 78, noes 52.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. PRATT. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. WHEELER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 58, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Ball, Barry, Belcher, Bugg, Caskin, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Dickinson, Drum, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Fuller, Goode, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Letcher, Maurice, Middlesworth, Morgan, Murray, Parker, Peck, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, David Ritchie, Rufin, Sage, Seymour, Skelton, George W. Smyth, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, Walley, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, David J. Bailey, Barkedale, Bell, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Chandler, Clark, Colquitt, Cook, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Easman, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Giddings, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kurtz, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, McDougall, McNair, Mace, Macy, Mayall, Smith Miller, Olds, Phelps, Powell, Pringle, Thomas Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Lester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Wade, Watbridge, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, and Yates—84.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was then taken on Mr. Cobb's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to know if it is not in order to consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAGE] now?

Mr. SAGE. Did I understand the Chair to say that the previous question cut off my amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated distinctly at the time.

Mr. SAGE. Would a motion to reconsider enable me to offer that amendment now?

Mr. ROBBINS. My motion is not debatable.

Mr. SAGE. If it would, I desire to move to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Robbins] to lay his motion to reconsider on the table shall fail, and his motion to reconsider shall prevail, the bill will then be again open for amendment or commitment, provided the House chooses to relieve itself from the operation of the previous question. The motion now pending is to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WHEELER. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 83, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Bell, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Chandler, Chrisman, Clark, Colquitt, Cook, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Giddings, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancey Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kuriz, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, McDougall, McNair, Mace, Macy, Mayall, Smith Miller, Olds, Phelps, Powell, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Wade, Walbridge, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Witte, and Yates—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Barry, Belcher, Bugg, Caskie, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Dickinson, Drum, Edgerton, Edmunds, Ellison, English, Goode, Grey, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Hiestler, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Letcher, Maurice, Middleswarth, Morgan, Murray, Parker, Peck, Phillips, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Sage, Seymour, Skelton, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, John B. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Vail, Walley, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—60.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. PRATT. Is not my motion entitled to precedence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. PRATT. I now make the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHEELER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. INGERSOLL demanded tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. PRATT's motion; and a division being had, there were—aye 51, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The motion is lost.

Mr. PRATT. I now move that the House adjourn, and upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. PRATT's motion; and the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon seconding the demand for the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WHEELER demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill; which were ordered.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Is it in order to introduce an amendment now?

The SPEAKER. It is not; no amendment is in order, no motion is in order, and no speech is in order.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I do not want to make a speech.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, David J. Bailey, Ball, Barksdale, Bell, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Chandler, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Colquitt, Cook, Curtis, Dawson, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Giddings, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, J. Glancey Jones, Keitt, Kurtz, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, McNair, Mace, Macy, Mayall, Smith Miller, Olds, Feckham, Powell, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Sapp, Shannon, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vansant, Wade, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, and Yates—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Barry, Belcher, Bennett, Bugg, Caskie, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dean, Dent, Dickinson, Drum, Edger-

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. WHEELER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; and it was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. I call the previous question upon the adoption of the title of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was taken, and the title adopted.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

STATE OF OREGON.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to withdraw his motion, to allow me to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, for the purpose of having it referred.

Mr. PRATT. I prefer to insist upon my motion.

Mr. LANE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to introduce the bill. The time is drawing near when the House has made territorial business the special order, and it is important that this bill should be acted on.

Mr. PRATT. If no other gentleman objects I will not.

There being no objection,

Mr. LANE introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to enable the people of Oregon Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest that it is not customary to print bills until they have been reported by a committee.

Mr. LANE. My reason for having the printing ordered now, was, that the time which is to elapse before the territorial business is to come up for consideration is so short, that I feared it would not be printed in time if I waited until the committee reported upon it.

Mr. JONES. I would suggest, then, that the bill be referred immediately to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LANE. I would prefer that it should go to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the bill was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed. Debate is not therefore in order.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, then I will only say that it is contrary to the usual custom of the House.

Mr. PRATT. I now ask for a vote upon my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLDS. I appeal to the gentleman to allow me to report a bill. I will state that I expect to leave the city in the morning.

Mr. PRATT. I would withdraw the motion if I could do so consistently; but if I give way for the committees to report, I do not know where it would end.

Mr. COBB. This is the business legitimately before the House during the morning hour, which has not yet expired. I hope the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will be voted down, and that we shall go on with the call of the committees for reports.

The question was put upon the motion to go into committee; and, upon a division, there were—aye 59, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and VAIL, were appointed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to; the tellers having reported—aye 67, noes 52.

WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of New York, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee for consideration, is on the amendments of the Senate to the West Point Military Academy appropriation bill. Under the order of the House, debate will close in five minutes after the committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAVEN. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means was for non-concurrence in three of the Senate amendments. The vote will be taken on the separate propositions, I suppose. The first one is in reference to the appropriation, for the repairs and additions to professors' quarters, of $5,000. Debate is closed, and I presume every member has made up his mind on the appropriation. Therefore, I hope that the vote will be at once taken on it.

The Clerk then reported the first amendment of the Senate, as follows:

For repairs and additions to professors' quarters, $5,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That amendment from the Senate proposes to appropriate $5,000 for repairs and additions to the officers' quarters at the Military Academy. We have no estimates, no plan of what additions they intend to make to those quarters. Under this provision, if it is passed into a law, they may commence houses there, in addition to the officers' quarters, which will involve an expenditure of fifty or a hundred thousand dollars, or perhaps half a million of dollars.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. What amendment does the gentleman from Tennessee propose?

Mr. JONES. I move to strike out the word "additions." I hope that none of the Senate's amendment will be entertained, and particularly not that part of it which authorizes them to make additions to those quarters, until they shall submit some estimates and some plan, and give us some reason why additions to these quarters are needed; why is it that the quarters are not as well adapted now for the accommodation of the officers as they have been in past years? We are acting upon this amendment entirely in the dark, without limitation, without restriction, without plan, and without reason.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to say a few words in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, not that I do not concur in much that he says, but I wish to submit a few remarks in regard to the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means to strike out all these amendments of the Senate.

I understand the gentleman from Tennessee, who is one of the Committee of Ways and Means, to state they have no information, no report, no estimates showing the necessity of these appropriations. Well, now, I am unable to lay my hands immediately on the report of the visitors to the West Point Academy, a board recognized by Congress, and for which we make an annual appropriation of about $3,000; but my impression is, that that board, composed of highly intelligent gentlemen from all parts of the United States, have recommended each and all of these amendments. I may be wrong in this, but I know that they have recommended to Congress several important reforms and improvements in this West Point Military Academy, which I believe are required by the public necessity, and are for the interest of the institution and of the whole country.

If it was in order, I would move to refer this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire particularly with regard to the necessity of these amendments, and some other reforms which I think are highly needed in that institution.

Sir, I am the friend of the institution. I wish to see it prosper; because I think that history, and the history of many of those educated there, shows the necessity of it for this great country. But I would reform abuses; I would make improvements; I would not withhold the small sum of five, or even twenty thousand dollars, if needed, to improve the institution.

It may be necessary that you should make this appropriation of $5,000 in this bill, in order to make the quarters of the officers you send there comfortable. It may be necessary that the $20,000 proposed by the Senate to this bill should be appropriated for a riding school. I believe that we ought to abolish at once the cavalry tactics at that institution, or we should conform, in some degree, to the experienced judgment and advice of military men, who are upon the ground to give us their advice and counsel. If it is necessary to give instructions in cavalry tactics in the institution at West Point, we should conform our action according to the advice of those who know best how to give it. Perhaps we ought to abolish these instructions altogether.

There is another reform which I would introduce, if this matter were referred to the Military Committee. I would abolish the Board of Visitors, as at present appointed. We at present appropriate $3,000 a year to send ten or fifteen gentlemen from all parts of the United States to West Point.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The general principles of the Academy at West Point are not under discussion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I can only say that I desire to confine myself to the section under consideration. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] would confine his remarks only to questions in order, he would make very few speeches indeed. He is scarcely ever in order. I wish to say a single word more without detaining the House—

Mr. JONES. I ask the Chair to decide the question of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate and House— [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAGE. Is debate exhausted upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the amendment to the amendment. The question now comes up on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon concurring with the Senate amendment, which reads as follows:

For repairs and additions to professors' quarters, $5,000.

Mr. SAGE. I propose to add "one dollar" to the amount.

As was intimated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR], all these appropriations have been recommended by the Board of Visitors at West Point. If Congress are to make annual appropriations of the amount which has been made for a few years past for the support of this institution, I deem it good policy to make the appropriation the least possible. This institution at West Point is supported at an annual cost of about $130,000. We appoint a Board of Visitors to go there, attend to the details, and look after the affairs of the institution. We should either abolish entirely this Board of Visitors that we send there from all parts of the country, or we should certainly make the appropriations asked for. And amongst these appropriations I believe the one which was so much ridiculed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON], the other day, should receive the careful consideration of this House, and be acted upon. I refer to the appropriation which provides for cavalry exercise—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The hippodrome.

Mr. SAGE. Here is an expenditure proposed for this Academy, of $130,000. The Board of Visitors, as I before stated, is composed of gentlemen from all parts of the United States, and their report of last year recommends this appropriation for the riding hall, and here we are disregarding that recommendation, and no allusion is made to it except by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR], who just preceded me. I think we should be prepared to act much more understandingly upon this whole subject, if gentlemen who have not read this report would do so. It is an important document, and I ask that it may be read at the Clerk's desk, that all may see what the whole report is.

The report was read, as follows:

"1st. The revised regulations for the United States Military Academy require that instruction shall be given in cavalry tactics. To carry out this requirement, we are all of us entirely satisfied that a new building should be erected without delay. A decent regard for safety to the lives and limbs of the cadets requires this, as well as their successful progress in this branch of instruction. It is the opinion of the Superintendent, that the course of equitation cannot be properly taught without it, and that the room now used for the purpose is extremely dangerous to the lives and limbs of the cadets.

"It is estimated that, in addition to the amount before appropriated, ($2,000,) the sum of $21,197 will be required for this object.

"2d. The cadet's hospital should be enlarged and improved. A brick front should be built extending to the center, flush with the front of the wings, to connect the wards with the additional space so formed by cutting the present windows into doors; also, two projections in rear, equal in width to the north and south wards, which shall contain the staircases, water-closets, and bath-rooms; the whole to be raised one story (ten feet) in addition to the present height of the building. To accomplish this will require an appropriation of $6,500.

"3d. Quarters for sixteen officers and two families should be constructed, in the form of a brick building of two stories, with a basement with two wings, (one for each family.) It is estimated that it will require about $28,000 to accomplish this object.

"5th. Suitable stables may be erected by an appropriation, in addition to the amount already appropriated, ($3,000,) of $7,491.

"6th. We are of the opinion that the number of the cadets should be increased, so as to correspond with the number of Senators of the United States, by adding two from each State, and that the recommendations of Senators in each State should have great weight in selecting the cadets from their respective States to make up this increased number.

"7th. We are of the opinion that great care should be taken in the selection of cadets; that is, to be made from among those who have the highest qualifications—physical, intellectual, and moral.

"8th. That the period of instruction should be extended to five years. This may be accomplished without any additional expense to the nation, and with great advantage to the cadets. They should be qualified to take and hold with honor to themselves the highest positions in civil as well as military life.

"9th. We are of the opinion that the decisions of the Academic Board, as to the capacity and conduct of the cadets, and their qualifications to be admitted and continued in the academy, should be considered as final and conclusive.

"10th. We are all of the opinion that the pay of the cadets should be increased, making it at least $23 20 per month; and a very large majority of the board are of the opinion that it should be increased to $30 per month.

"11th. We concur in the recommendations made by the Board of Visitors last year, that the pay of the Superintendent should not be less than $3,000; that the pay of the instructors of French and drawing should be made equal to that of the principals in other departments; that the principal instructors of practical engineering and of artillery, &c., should be allowed the same compensation as other principal professors; that the first assistant instructor of drawing and French should be allowed the same pay as the first assistant in all the other departments; that all the secondary instructors and teachers taken from the Army should be allowed $10 per month extra pay; and that the fencing master, who now instructs two classes, should be allowed the pay of $900 per annum.

"12th. If the period of instruction should be extended to five years, we are of the opinion that the study of elocution, writing, English composition, history, and the evidences of Christianity, should make a part of the course to be arranged by the Academic Board; and that the study of rhetoric should be postponed to the second year. For additional facts and arguments in favor of the measures we recommend, we refer to the reports of the several committees above named.

"13th. We concur in the recommendation especially of the committee on instruction, that an appropriation of $5,000 should be made for the purpose of establishing at this point a museum of artillery, and for the reasons by them stated."

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to say a word to the committee in opposition to the amendment proposed by my colleague, [Mr. SAGE], and in support of the conclusion to which the Committee of Ways and Means have come, which conclusion was a non-concurrence in the Senate amendment. The objection, Mr. Chairman, taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], it seems to me, is not met by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SAGE]; nor is it met by the documents which are before this committee. The objection he makes is this, that the amendment which is proposed by the Senate, and to which the Committee of Ways and Means were opposed, is indefinite, and points to nothing certain; and that under the amendment you may commence the erection of any number or amount of buildings, of any quality, of any size, or upon any plan, and without any restriction or control by Congress, and next year come here and ask means to finish those erections, without which they will be useless; that you may commence them as we have been in the habit of commencing custom-houses and other public buildings, upon a deficiency. Yes, sir, begin them upon a deficiency, nobody is responsible for having made a plan, a drawing, or an estimate.

Now, sir, all that has been said on this subject in the documents before us, is to be found in the letter of Colonel Lee, to General Totten, of October 8, 1853, and in the report of the Board of Visitors, a portion of which has been read by my colleague, [Mr. SAGE.] I will now read what Colonel Lee says upon the question. He says this, and this, I believe, is all he does say:

"In my report of last year, the want of quarters for the officers on duty at the academy, was stated."

That is what he says in reference to quarters for the officers. He then goes on to say in reference to the houses for the professors:

"Experience since that time has convinced me of the advantages of also adding to the houses of the professors."

This is the proposition which we now have under consideration, in reference to these additions to the houses of the professors. He says further:

"They are inadequate to the healthful accommodation of their families, and inferior to those provided at the colleges and State institutions. An appropriation of $5,000 is asked to render them more comfortable."

That is all that Colonel Lee says upon the subject. "Experience," says he, "since that time, has convinced me of the advantages of also adding to the houses of these professors." And the only reason he gives for asking these additions to be made to the professors' houses is, that they are inferior to those provided at the colleges and State institutions. Why, sir, the same number of professors are there now as at any former time, needing the same number of rooms and the same accommodations now as formerly; there can, therefore, be no great or urgent necessity for additional houses, unless you propose to increase the number of professors, or unless their families are increased.

Mr. LETCHER. I suppose the object is to make them more genteel.

Mr. HAVEN. That is all Colonel Lee says upon the subject which I can find in the document, and, as I before remarked, the only other official information we have upon the subject is in the report of the Board of Visitors, of which a portion has already been read. I will now read all that is said upon the subject of this appropriation in that report:

"4th. Suitable additions may be made to the quarters of the professors by an appropriation, in addition to the amount already appropriated, ($3,000,) of $3,051 35."

That is all I find upon the subject in the report of the Board of Visitors. They say that "suitable additions may be made."

A sub-committee of the visitors, in their report to the Board of Visitors, say:

"There has been heretofore appropriated the sum of $3,000 for the improvement and addition to officers' quarters. This sum is still subject to the direction of the Superintendent, who has hesitated in its expenditure, for the reason that it is entirely inadequate to the object had in view."

"There are seven professors, whose quarters are so small and restricted, as to render them inconsistent, not with comfort, but with their absolute wants."

"Many of these gentlemen have families, for whose comfort their present quarters are entirely too small, leaving them no apartment for study, or for the arrangement of apparatus, books, drawings, cabinets, &c. From the estimate of the Superintendent, an additional appropriation of $5,051 35 will be required in order to make such improvements to officers' quarters as are absolutely necessary, and the committee earnestly recommend that such additional appropriation be asked for."

There, sir, that is all I can find in the documents on this subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are we doing here? What do the Senate propose to do? Why, sir, they propose to make an appropriation that will allow the commencement of buildings for which we have no plans, and for which we have no estimates, and of which we know nothing that a prudent man should know. No one who is responsible in any degree to this Government, in the premises, has pointed out to us the necessity of this appropriation beyond what I have read, nor has any one given us any estimates of the amount which will be required to complete these houses; and if this amendment is passed, and becomes a law, they may lay the foundations of a row of houses that we shall be asked for appropriation after appropriation for years to come to complete.

Now, in reference to the Board of Visitors. I have no desire or occasion to attack them. There may be much in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON], that they merely report what they are told they may appropriately report; but of that I know nothing—I presume them to be honorable and fit men. The only suggestion we have from them, as a Board, is what I have already read, that "suitable additions may be made to the quarters of the professors by an appropriation, in addition to the amount already appropriated, ($3,000,) of $5,051 35." Now, it seems that the amount of $3,000 has already been appropriated, and has been at the disposal of the institution for the year past, which they might have used for the purpose of repairs, and it appears they have not used it, but ask that $5,051 35 may be appropriated in addition. Now sir, they give no good and sufficient reason for asking this additional appropriation, which, of itself, in my opinion, is a sufficient reason for non-concurring in this amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SAGE. If there be no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. BLISS. I ask the recognition of the Chair at this time for my own personal convenience. I wish simply to say that I had intended to have made some remarks upon the bill for the organization of the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas; but such is the state of my health that I shall not be able to do it. I desire, therefore, the consent of the House to publish the remarks I intended to have made in the Globe, and allow them to take their place in the regular proceedings of the House.

A general assent was expressed. [This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Senate appropriating $5,000 for the officers' quarters.

The question was taken; and the amendment was non-concurred in.

The Clerk read the next amendment of the Senate, as follows:

For cavalry exercise hall, $20,000.

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed without amendment House bill No. 32, entitled "An act to authorize the school commissioners of fractional township No. 1, of range No. 10 east, in Alabama, to locate a half section of land for school purposes; and had also passed Senate bill No. 335, entitled "An act for the relief of the Burlington University of Iowa," in which it asked the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. BISSELL. Before the vote is taken on the amendment which has just been read, I desire to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment?

Mr. BISSELL. I do. I move, pro forma, that the appropriation be increased five dollars. I hope that the committee is not going to vote too precipitately on this amendment. For my own part, I have seen nothing yet to change my views in regard to the propriety of our concurring with the Senate. I have heard nothing to change them.

Now the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] who called up this bill the other day, told us the views which brought the Committee of Ways and Means, of which he is a member, to the action which they took on this subject. He told us that the committee were in much doubt whether to recommend that appropriation or not, but that finally they concluded to recommend that the House disagree with the Senate; for the reason, said he, that we feared that when brought into the House it would be ridiculed here, as we know that it had been for several years before, and that the institution would be injured more than the chance of passing the appropriation would benefit it. Now who ever before heard of such a reason as that emanating from a committee? Inasmuch as this appropriation had been frequently pressed on the House before, and had met only with ridicule, they feared that it would meet with ridicule and nothing else, which would injure the institution! Therefore, after deliberation, they concluded to reject the amendment, to recommend the House to non-concur in it.

I do not cast my vote on any such principle as that; and I am proud to say that the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, never recommend the rejection or adoption of any proposition on any such principle. Is it right? Is this appropriation needed for the benefit of that institution, and to enable the Government to derive all the advantages which it ought to have? That is the question, and the only one which ought to be considered. And we were informed by the gentleman from Missouri, who followed me in the discussion the other day, and who is not now in his seat, that there were appropriated some seventeen years ago, when he was chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate—and he had more influence in that body than any other member there—$30,000 were appropriated for a riding hall at West Point; and it was done with his approbation. Seventeen years have gone by, and now, when a similar proposition is made here, he takes his cue apparently from the hint thrown out by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] and ridicules the proposition, and does nothing but ridicule it.

Mr. HIBBARD. Well, give some reason for it.

Mr. BISSELL. I am now merely replying to some remarks made by the gentleman from Missouri; but I am asked to give some reason why it is necessary. I will do so with pleasure, although I think it would be unnecessary to those who heard me the other day.

In the first place, in consequence of the latitude and altitude of the location of the institution at West Point, they have a long winter, a long fall, a long spring, and a very short summer. During a large portion of the winter the snow lies deep upon the mountains there; during several weeks in the spring and autumn the ground is filled with frost, or is in process of breaking up, when a horse will break in at every step he takes; and in winter, when snow is on the ground, rain falls upon it, which freezes, but not enough to bear a horse; so that he cuts through it some twelve or eighteen inches at every step.

Mr. HAVEN. I submit to the committee that no reasons have been given by the gentleman who last addressed us [Mr. BISSELL] in favor of his amendment, that ought to control this committee in its action.

The gentleman is slightly mistaken, I think, in reference to the ground that I took when the bill was up the other day. I did not undertake to say that the Committee of Ways and Means were fearful that this proposition would be attacked with ridicule, and that that was the reason why they reported against the amendment. What I did say was substantially this: that propositions of this character, and nearly akin to it, had been recommended and been before the House year after year, nearly as long as I could remember; that they had been attacked here in debate, and that I feared these repeated endeavors to ingraft them on the academy bill, when it had been so repeatedly refused, would have the effect or tendency to bring this institution into discredit. I submit to this committee that I am right in that. I submit that these repeated applications, year after year, for what Congress has again and again refused—applications unaccompanied by any good and sufficient reasons for their constant renewal, whether they are resisted by ridicule or not—are calculated, or have the tendency, to bring the institution into disrepute and discredit. Sir, I am as little controlled by the fear of ridicule as my friend from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.] And the fear of the imputation has as little control over me as the fear of ridicule itself.

Now, a word as to the positions taken the other day by my friend who has spoken in favor of this amendment now. As I understood the gentleman from Illinois then, he was very specific in declaring that the reasons which induced him to support the proposition this year, although heretofore he had been opposed to it—and I will set off the gentleman's position in that respect against the position of the gentleman from Missouri—he said particularly that the reasons which induced him to support the proposition now were not on account of the effect it would have on the cadets, but because the ground for some six months in the year was so uneven and hummocky—I think that was his word—that the horses were in danger, and that the horses could not perform the service and evolutions there with safety. Now, I have no such desire to protect the horses at West Point, or rather I have no such apprehensions in reference to them. The colonel who recommends this appropriation this year—for the twentieth time, for aught I know—and the Board of Visitors, differ, however, from the gentleman. They tell us, in reference to this proposition, in substance, that the room is necessary for the cadets; that "a decent regard for safety to the lives and limbs of the cadets requires this hall, as well as their successful progress in this branch of instruction."

The colonel says that a sheltered room is as necessary, in his opinion, for the proper and economical instruction of this course of education, as any other. It would require one of large dimensions, and built for the purpose. No plan, no estimate in detail, from any responsible source, is laid before the committee. The amendment now under consideration is open to the precise objection to which the last one offered was. I do not desire to argue the question here that was argued by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] as to the propriety and necessity of this course of instruction. I take it for granted that we desire it taught.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] tells us to-day, in substance, that this riding school is not intended for the benefit and protection of the cadet himself, but for convenience and safety to the horses in using them. Colonel Lee tells us in his report that there are six months in each year, from September until June, that the weather is unfit for this exercise in the open air. Is not this rather strongly stated? I submit to this committee—for there are many gentlemen upon this floor who can speak from actual knowledge—whether, in the months of September, October, and November even, persons in the country in that latitude, are not harvesting their potatoes and corn in the fields without any inconvenience from the weather? I undertake to say that before May has gone and June is reached—for May is one of the months included in the statement against cavalry exercise in the open air—we shall have beautiful weather and settled grounds at West Point. I believe, sir, it is not unusual to have settled roads and good traveling there in April, although this year it seems an unpleasant month. I am ready to have the question taken.

Mr. BISSELL. If there is no objection, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon concurring with the Senate amendment.

Mr. PECKHAM. I offer an amendment to increase the appropriation $100.

I understand the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, to occupy a doubtful position in regard to this appropriation, and to be undecided as to whether it is proper or not. I am satisfied his judgment, his knowledge of the facts in reference to West Point, will not permit him to say that it is really improper. He is apprehensive that the discussion of this subject may injure that institution. I have no such apprehension. It will bear full discussion. He objects that no plans, no estimates have been submitted. I submit to the gentleman, that if no plans or estimates were submitted, it was the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to have inquired for them, and to have had them submitted by the proper officers. But I am told by gentlemen near me, that they have been submitted, and that they amount to some $21,000.

It appears that an appropriation was made by the last Congress of $2,000 to build a hall for cavalry exercises, but that it has not been applied, for the sole reason that the officers deemed it utterly insufficient for the purpose intended. This shows the judgment of that Congress, that such a hall for cavalry exercise was necessary. The refusal to use any part of the appropriation when, its insufficiency was ascertained, exhibits the integrity of the officers in charge. The appropriation now asked is for a hall for cavalry exercises, which are deemed to hold a very important part in the system of education at West Point. I need not advert to the importance of an efficient cavalry. It is appreciated in every nation, and in every army of Europe. I have not time to enlarge upon this point, though I should be happy to do so, and to show its indispensable necessity to every efficient army.

But how is efficiency in cavalry to be attained? Sir, I submit that it is only to be attained by proper instruction, by drilling, by discipline. It is said, to be sure, that our boys in this country are all good riders. They are. But will good riders alone make an efficient cavalry? The most inefficient cavalry in the field are those composed of what we call good riders, but who are untaught in cavalry exercises, and are without proper discipline. Now, sir, in Europe, for instance in Russia, there is one of the best riding halls to be found in any country; it is six hundred feet long, and two hundred feet wide. They have, I believe, men of some hardihood there—yet a covered riding hall is deemed necessary there, where their young men are well and thoroughly instructed in cavalry exercise. In France they have three riding halls for cavalry exercise, and in them the young men of France are instructed. There, even in that pleasant climate, covered riding schools are deemed necessary, to train their young men, who are to instruct others—and they have them.

I wish I had time to enlarge upon these facts; upon the example of other nations, who understand this subject, who know the value of well-trained cavalry, and practice on their knowledge.

In France, sir, young men are taken from the school at St. Cyr, a place near Paris, and sent to these riding halls at Saumur, upon the Loire, and kept there twenty-one months; and then, if they are of sufficient ability to sustain an examination, they are transferred to their regiment; and, after being kept there for a time, and before they can be promoted to a captaincy, they have to go back to these institutions at Saumur again, and remain there for eighteen months longer; and then they are not promoted unless they can sustain a rigid and thorough examination.

Mr. BENSON. I desire to say a single word in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. PECKHAM,] and in opposition to the amendment of the Senate. I rise for that purpose, sir, because I am a friend to the West Point Academy, and as such, I believe our legislation should be calculated to protect that institution. Well, sir, I ask, why is it necessary to load down this bill so that the appropriations, which are absolutely necessary, will be lost?

By referring to the bill which has been printed, and which is upon our desks, I find that the appropriations for this academy amount to $144,281, independent of the amendments which have been added to it by the Senate. Now, sir, I ask why add any more to it, unless it is necessary to do so in order to secure the efficiency of the institution? It is well known to those who have kept an eye upon this institution for years past, that it was fast losing its hold upon the public mind; and but for the occurrence of the Mexican war, which developed the ability, patriotism, and efficiency of the officers who were educated at that institution, in my humble opinion, the annual appropriations for its support would, long before this time, have been lost.

Now, why is it necessary to do anything more than enough to sustain efficiently that institution? Let gentlemen look for a moment and see where the boys come from who go to this academy. By law, they come from every congressional district in the Union; from the hills and valleys, as well as cities, of the country, and it is not necessary to put them into a band-box, or into any hall, for the purpose of teaching them to ride. I think that the boy who is sent to that institution from my district will know how to ride better than those who go there and are taught to ride solely in this pocket edition of a riding school. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] says that a set of good riders make a poor body of cavalry. I take it that you cannot have good cavalry without good riders.

Again, it is said that the climate is inclement at West Point. Sir, is the climate more inclement at West Point than it is in Maine? I believe the location of my district is further north than West Point; yet the boys sixteen years old in my district find time enough to learn to ride, and are, most of them, as good riders as they would be if they had learned to ride in a building erected for that purpose.

Mr. PECKHAM. What do the cavalry do in Maine?

Mr. BENSON. They fight the enemy when called upon to do so; and they do not go into hedges, or wood-sheds, or riding halls either, to learn to ride.

But it is said, again, that in Russia and in France they have schools for the purpose of instructing their young men in the art of riding. Sir, we in America have riding schools, too. Almost every farm in this broad land is a riding school, where our young men are taught to become as good riders as you can find in the world. And I do not believe it is necessary for us in republican America to go to aristocratic Russia or to imperial France for examples how to teach our boys. I believe we have a policy at home which we shall find will answer our purpose quite as well. Let the boys be taught at home, as they will be; and during the four years of instruction at West Point there will be found sufficient time in the free, open air, in suitable weather, to give them the graces of horsemanship and a knowledge of cavalry tactics, without incurring this expense.

But again, it is said that this hall is not wanted for the benefit of the boys, but to protect the officers and the horses. Now, sir, I do not believe it is necessary for us to erect a riding hall for the protection of the horses; and if the officers need it—if the officers, in other words, are not competent to perform their duties without these additional accommodations, we had better exchange them, if necessary, which I do not believe, and get those more efficient in their places. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will refuse to adopt this amendment of the Senate. I do not believe it is necessary for the maintenance of the institution; and, in my judgment, it will endanger those appropriations which are material to the usefulness—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PECKHAM. I desire to say a word more on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. No further remarks are in order. The question is now upon the amendment offered by the gentleman himself.

Mr. PECKHAM. I withdraw that amendment, and offer another, to increase the appropriation $110.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a remark or two in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. With great respect to the gentleman from Maine, I desire to say that he certainly does not mean to have this House understand that he is perfectly familiar or acquainted with what is necessary to constitute an efficient cavalry, or what is important to that end. I do not doubt or deny the position which he has asserted. He says they have exceedingly fine horsemen in Maine. He tells us what his young men can do. Amen. Do not we all know that not only in Maine, but everywhere in the United States, we have as good horsemen as can be found in the world? No one here denies that; but, sir, is that all that is necessary to make efficient cavalry? I am told by those whose experience in the Army entitles their opinions to the highest respect, and who, if I were to mention their names, would be recognized as such, that undrilled cavalry are utterly useless and unreliable—far more so than undisciplined infantry.

Mr. McNAIR. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New York is not speaking in opposition to the amendment, but directly in favor of it.

Mr. PECKHAM. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I believe, is out of order; I am speaking in support of an amendment which I have just offered. Now, sir, to give you an illustration: There are no better horsemen in the world than the Mamelukes, in Egypt, and yet they proved to be inefficient as cavalry. They would ride directly up to the infantry, and even jump their horses over into the infantry squares; and yet, in their conflicts with the army of Napoleon, because they were not properly drilled and disciplined to act in masses, they proved to be utterly inefficient as cavalry.

Sir, it is a well known fact, a conceded maxim, as I am told, with military men, that it requires three times as long to drill a corps of cavalry as a corps of infantry or artillery; and it is worse than idle to assume, as gentlemen seem to assume here, that all that is necessary to make good cavalry is that the men shall be good riders. Besides, the young men instructed here, are not only to understand it themselves, but to be rendered competent to instruct others. They are to be made disciplinarians. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] referred to the Utah Indians as objects for imitation. There are no better riders than the Utah Indians, but what would they amount to as cavalry? How would they act in masses?

Now, Mr. Chairman, to the facts presented from all countries abroad where they have an efficient cavalry, that they all have extensive covered riding halls, and deem them indispensable, what is presented in answer? Why can we dispense with such a hall better than they can in Russia, or in France, or in England? Why, the gentleman from Maine told us that if we attempt to establish them we shall ruin this institution. Sir, with great respect to the gentleman, I think that I can appeal with safety to this committee, to its intelligence, to its reliance on doing what is right rather than on what the prejudices of constituents of members may say, to discharge its high duty to the country on this subject.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] does not presume to present any answer on the merits of this measure, but he has recourse entirely to ridicule; he appeals to the prejudices of members; he re-presents the productions of former years, the parasol and pelisse of the old lady from New England, and the five year-old Utah Indian boy. Will this committee regard that as an answer to an application for this riding hall, which has been made on the recommendation of every committee of visitors which has considered the subject, and by every Army officer, as well those disconnected with this academy as those attached to it, and sustained, too, by the example and practice of every civilized nation that have an efficient cavalry? We can afford to meet ridicule that comes in this shape. We have courage to meet that; but we cannot refuse to sustain this appropriation, and we ought not to have courage to refuse, when it is necessary to the efficiency of our cavalry; when it is properly recommended; and when there is no rational objection presented against it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as has been before remarked, this recommendation of appropriation for the construction of a riding hall has been presented to Congress and thrust on its consideration for the last ten or twelve years, if not for a longer period. Up to the present time all that has been asked is $12,000; but I suppose with the great improvements which have been made in riding halls of hippodromes over circuses, [laughter]—

Mr. HENN. I rise to a question of order. I know my friend will take it in good part. If we go on discussing this question in the way we have, we shall never see the end of it. The amendment proposes to increase the appropriation $110. The gentleman who should have spoken in favor of it did not speak to it at all, and neither is the gentleman from Tennessee opposing it, as he should do to entitle him to the floor.

Mr. JONES. I am speaking against the amendment. I do not want to see it adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see that the gentleman's remarks are out of order.

Mr. JONES. Now they ask for $20,000, instead of $12,000. There is no particular reason assigned for the change. The gentleman from New York proposes to increase it $110. Now, I cannot conceive the necessity of one dollar of this appropriation. Why is it necessary to have a house in which to train young men to ride? From the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it seems to me that for the service the country will want mounted troops for some years to come. West Point, on the hills, amid ice and snow, is the place of all others where we should teach our cavalry soldiers. Where will you want your troops? On the plains, in the gorges, among the rocks of the Rocky Mountains, and elsewhere in the country between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans.

I would ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he supposes the mode of taking youths under shelter into a riding hall, and on horses trained to start at the whistle and stop at the crack of the whip, is the proper one to teach those to ride who are to be called on to protect our frontiers against the Indians? Why, sir, take one of these persons who have learned to ride in these halls for exhibition through the country, where they are well schooled, and put them on a paved street here in the city, and they will be as awkward at riding as if they had never exhibited or performed at all. They have their horses trained, and are trained themselves to suit the action of the horses, and they know exactly, when they start, the gait they are to go at, and where they will stop. But put them into the field or on to the mountains, and they will be as awkward as if they had never seen a riding hall.

Sir, if you want these cadets to learn to ride efficiently, so that their services will be available, and so that they will not have unlearned in the field what they have learned at the academy, and to learn anew, let them ride in the hot sun and in the rain and snow; let them ride upon the mountains and the hills.

Mr. PECKHAM. Does the gentleman suppose they do not ride in the open air also?

Mr. JONES. I suppose they do not, since they want a riding hall.

Mr. PECKHAM. They exercise in the hall at the proper time, and at other times in the open air.

Mr. JONES. Well, you will find that the sun is too hot for them in summer, and that the rain and snow are too cold for them in winter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PECKHAM. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BOYCE. I move to amend the amendment so as to reduce the appropriation to one dollar.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose no one can be more favorable to this West Point institution than I am; but I think that the true policy of those who are friendly to the institution is to restrict it within the narrowest circle of economy—to spend no more money upon it than is absolutely necessary.

Now, is this appropriation absolutely necessary? By no means. What is the object of this riding school? The distinguished gentleman from the northwest [Mr. BISSELL] tells us that his object in advocating the riding school is to save the horses. But what is the object of the riding school? Why, it is to teach the cadets how to ride. Well, there is a better way of teaching them how to ride than having a riding school—a very simple one, that costs nothing—and that is to require the youths to know how to ride before they go to West Point. That is the true idea. They are required now to be healthy, and stout, and hardy, and to submit to a physical examination; they ought also to be required to be able to ride like Camanche Indians. Learning to ride in a riding school! Why, the idea is absurd. When they leave the academy, and take their places in the Army, they will have to ride among the Indians in New Mexico and California, and will riding learned in a riding school serve them then? They will have to ride like the Camanche Indians, like the wind, and that kind of riding they can only learn, not in a riding school, but in the open air, on the hills and mountains. I say, then, that this riding school is not necessary for that purpose.

What is it necessary for, then? Why, it is only necessary to teach the cadets cavalry tactics—how to ride in squadrons and troops. That is all. Well, I submit that there must be sufficient good weather, in the course of the year, to enable them to learn those cavalry tactics in the open air. During six months of the year they can certainly ride in the open air; and, if so, six months is enough. I have seen good cavalry troops, who acted efficiently in the field, who did not have ten days' practice in the course of the year. What do they want to do? After they once know how to ride, it is very easy for them to become familiar with cavalry exercises.

Mr. BISSELL. But how will you teach them?

Mr. BOYCE. You can teach them very easily. I have seen cavalry in my State that will compare with any cavalry in the regular Army; and they do not practice more than ten days in the course of the year. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] speaks of the Mamelukes, and refers to the battle of the Pyramids. They were the best cavalry in the world; and why did they not succeed? Because they attacked hollow squares, in which were placed the best infantry soldiers in the world, with the genius of a Napoleon directing their movements. What did Napoleon say of them? He said, "Give me the Mameluke cavalry and the French infantry, and I will conquer the world."

Mr. LETCHER. There seems to be a very great difference of opinion among my Democratic friends, and I am somewhat perplexed how to vote in this conflict of opinion. Here are military gentlemen upon both sides of the House, and each one seems to have a peculiar set of opinions of his own, differing widely from those of all the others. I suggest, if the committee will agree to rise, that there is an experiment going on here, in Judiciary square, which may throw some light upon this question. The hippodrome will soon be prepared, and opened for exhibition, and we can then see how this thing of riding in a house will work. [Laughter.] As the matter now stands, I may give a wrong vote. Suppose I should follow the suggestions of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Boyce,] and it should turn out that I had given a wrong vote, I should regret it very much. Suppose I should follow the suggestions of the other side, still I might have cause to regret it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Boyce.]

Mr. BOYCE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment, to increase the amount $100, in order to make a few remarks.

There seems to be in the discussion of this appropriation of $20,000, as recommended by the Board of Visitors, very great misapprehension in the minds of the committee. The appropriation is not asked for a riding school. What is it asked for then? The Superintendent of the Military Academy, in his report, which is laid before all the members of the House, says that the appropriation is asked for cavalry exercises and instruction. There is something else to be taught there than riding, if I understand it; and it is required that instruction in cavalry exercises shall be given. Every boy of sixteen there, I presume, knows how to ride, but it is required, also, that he shall be instructed in cavalry and sword exercises. If any answer was needed to the arguments of the gentlemen who oppose this appropriation, it may be found in the report of the Superintendent of the Military Academy, which I have before me, dated last October. I will read what he says as the best reply I can make to all that is said against this amendment.

I read from a letter of Colonel R. E. Lee, the Superintendent of the Academy, of the date of October 8th, 1853. He says:

"I cannot help again calling your attention to the necessity of a hall for cavalry exercise and instruction. The knowledge of cavalry tactics is necessary to the cadets in the performance of their duty in the Army. It is so recognized, and a sufficient number of horses, dragoons, and cavalry officers have been placed at the Academy for their instruction. The three higher classes are instructed in this branch, and are divided into squads, and parade daily at stated hours, as in their other studies. When the weather permits, the instruction is given on the plain; but from September to June, the period allotted to this course, the weather and ground in this climate are so often unfit for this exercise in the open air, that for the want of a hall the regular lesson must be omitted, and the provision and expense of men and horses lost to the country, and the time and opportunity to the cadets. A sheltered room is as necessary, in my opinion, for the proper and economical instruction of this course as any other. It requires one of large dimensions, and must be built for the purpose. A plan and estimate of the proposed building have been submitted to you. Two thousand dollars are already appropriated for its commencement, and the balance of the estimate, $20,000, is now asked for its completion."

Young men are required, for twenty-four dollars per month, to board and clothe themselves at this institution. They study a greater portion of the time within doors, and are not expected to go out like soldiers, in all weathers, and exercise on horseback a few hours a day. Their studies are regular and systematically conducted, and a portion of every day, whether like the three last days which we have had even in this latitude, where it has been exceedingly disagreeable to be out—I say a portion of every day, rain or shine, snow or hail, this instruction in equestrianism is to be given and ought to be given.

Mr. LILLY. I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] for various reasons. First, I am opposed to the whole appropriation, for the reason that I do not consider it necessary. Gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject have said that the example furnished us in the Mexican war was decidedly in favor of these cavalry officers who were trained at West Point. If those gentlemen will but recur to the history of that war, they will learn that the most successful cavalry officer in that war, and almost the only one that gained renown, was Colonel May, who learned to ride in this city, among the ravines and inequalities of ground around this city; and I undertake to say that he was never in a riding hall in his life.

If it is absolutely necessary for these officers to be taught riding in this hall, why is it not quite as necessary that the men in the ranks should also be taught to ride? You should, in order to have an efficient cavalry, have the men trained and drilled as well as the officers. Yet was it ever proposed to have a cavalry hall erected for the purpose of training the men in the ranks as you do the officers? I also ask these military gentlemen whether the most efficient portion of the cavalry tactics is not in the charge? And I ask you how they, the men, are to learn to charge an enemy? Are you going to build a riding hall a quarter of a mile long, and teach them how to charge? I think the whole thing is an absurdity upon its face, and I hope the amendment of the Senate will not be concurred in.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, withdrew the amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I move to increase the appropriation $100. Mr. Chairman, I am sure there are some gentlemen in this Hall who are laboring under a mistake as to the true state of things in regard to the West Point Military Academy. It does not seem to be understood, as a matter of fact, that we have already a riding hall here, and have for the last twenty years kept it up.

A MEMBER. More than that.
